Wanklyn is still planning on staying in the architectural engineering program and active in Moore Hall. At this point, he said he is not planning his future too intensely.

"I will keep my options open because I never really know what opportunities might come about," he said.

For now, Wanklyn is content with the place he has made for himself at K-State.

"I think I have found my place here," he said. "I'm a piece in the puzzle. It's my home. It is where I belong."

from the Cotton Bowl to compensate those who wish to purchase them. In turn, the Bramlage ticket office will keep accepting ticket orders through Monday, no matter if the 12,000 allotment is sold or not.

"We'll take orders through Monday, and then we'll cut them off," Adolph said. "If we take an order, we'll guarantee them tickets."

Those interested in purchasing tickets can place an order in person at the ticket office, or via telephone by calling 532-7606 or (800) 221-CATS. Ticket office hours are 8 a.m. to 5 p.m., Monday through Friday.

Meanwhile, the KSU Alumni Association is continuing to offer official K-State Bowl Tour Packages. These packages include hotel accommodations, game ticket, pregame ticket and transportation to and from the pep rally, pregame and game.

According to Karen Schroeder, director of communications for the K-State Alumni Association, 796 bowl packages have been sold as of 5 p.m. Wednesday.

For more information on travel packs, call the Bowl Hotline at (800) 985-5231.

Quarterback Aso Pogi agreed. "You always want somebody who wants to be in a program," he said.

"This is his passion. This is where he wants to be."

Miles has served on staffs under such coaches as Bill McCartney at Colorado and Bo Schembechler at Michigan.

He also played for Schembechler at Michigan from 1972-75.

Miles takes over a program that, in terms of talent, is in better shape than when Simmons was hired in 1995. But it's also a program that has had just one winning season since 1988. The Cowboys finished 3-8 this year, 1-7 in the Big 12.

Miles said the administration has demonstrated a commitment to turning things around. Phillips wants to renovate the stadium, and work is wrapping up on a $54 million athletic center that includes new offices for coaches, a new weight-training facility and an academic center.

"The leadership here has removed the limits," Miles said. "The view is up and going. Let's raise it, let's do it, let's take this program forward."

"Had there been any other feeling here, we wouldn't be back."

U.S. man sentenced in Russia

By ANNA DOLGOV
The Associated Press

MOSCOW — U.S. businessman Edmond Pope was sentenced Wednesday to 20 years in prison by a Moscow, the first American convicted of espionage in Russia since a U-2 spy pilot four decades ago.

The White House called the conviction "unjustified and wrong," while a senior State Department official said there was no evidence Pope committed a crime and he should be released.

Pope, a retired U.S. Navy officer, contends the plans for a high-speed torpedo that he obtained weren't classified. Pope is the founder of CERF Technologies International, a company specializing in studying foreign maritime equipment.

The defense said the closed trial, in a drab Soviet-era building in an industrial section of Moscow, was largely predetermined, with the judge making no attempt to establish the truth.

The court rejected Pope's plea for clemency so that he could return home for medical treatment. Pope, 54, had suffered from bone cancer, which was in remission when he arrived in Russia earlier this year, and his family fears it may have returned during his incarceration in the grim Lefortovo prison.

In an emotional closing statement, Pope accused the prosecution of dealing in fabrication, and "absurd" conclusions.

"Although I spent eight months in prison in Russia, I am not a spy," the defense quoted Pope as saying. "The only decision that you must make is to let me go home to my family."

Pope's lawyer, Pavel Astakhov, said the verdict appeared to have been written before Pope made his closing statement. The court adjourned for less than three hours after Pope spoke, and returned with a 22-page guilty verdict.

"It is impossible to write in 2.5 hours a verdict that took an hour to read," Astakhov said.

Pope's family and lawyers, as well as the U.S. government, had called repeatedly for him to be freed on humanitarian grounds.

The verdict marked the first time a U.S. citizen was convicted of espionage in Russia since U-2 pilot Francis Gary Powers was shot down over the Soviet Union in 1960. Powers was freed and sent home two years later in exchange for a Soviet spy.

Pope, of State College, Pa., has seven days to appeal the sentence. But Astakhov noted that the last three days would be official holidays in Russia, meaning any appeal must be prepared within the next four days.

The sentencing comes amid concerns that Russia's secret services, which saw their powers trimmed under former President Boris Yeltsin, have started to flex their muscles again since his successor, 16-year KGB veteran Vladimir Putin, came to power.

Two prominent Russian environmentalists were tried on treason and espionage charges recently after reporting on pollution by the Russian navy — cases Astakhov called "all in the same league" with the action against Pope.

A spokesman for the Federal Security Service, Alexander Zdanovich, said the court ruling validated his agency's actions and promised that the FSB will continue to do all it can to guard Russia's state secrets.

From the start of the seven-week trial, Pope seemed to lose hope he would receive a fair hearing, Astakhov said.

Both the court translator and a state prosecutor had close links with the security services — a connection the defense said constituted a conflict of interest and violated Russian law.

Investigators repeatedly refused to include in the record testimony that did not suit their views of the case, and the judge refused to answer Pope's questions about the proceedings, Astakhov said. The defense filed about 200 motions, but all but a few were thrown out.

The main evidence against Pope seems to be a videotape, which was broadcast on Russian television, supposedly showing him handing over money to a Russian contact in payment for the torpedo plans.

Pope's key accuser, university professor Anatoly Babkin, recanted his testimony, saying it had been given under pressure.

"But the court still considered it possible to base its decision on that testimony," Astakhov said. "This case will go down in the history of jurisprudence for the number of mistakes that were committed."

Police investigate death of 4 in Wichita house

WICHITA — Relatives and neighbors wept and embraced outside a northeast Wichita home Thursday, hours after police found the bodies of four young people inside, dead of undetermined causes.

Police were investigating the deaths of the two males and two females as homicides. Lt. Ken Landwehr said two of the victims had head injuries, and while there was no immediate evidence they had been shot, police did not rule out gunfire.

Police said the fully clothed bodies were discovered at 9:02 a.m. by a friend who had been unable to reach one of the four. At mid-afternoon, the bodies remained in the house as police awaited a search warrant.

Police did not immediately release identities of the victims, reported to range in age from 16 to 22.

Landwehr said police checked a car that was parked outside the house.

Truck collides with bus; 9 victims hospitalized

KINGMAN, Kan. — A school bus carrying 29 students collided with a pickup truck on a dirt road near this south-central Kansas town Thursday. Most of the bus passengers and the two teen-agers in the truck were sent to hospitals with injuries.

At least three victims — one aboard the bus and two in the pickup — had serious injuries and were taken to Wichita hospitals. Six other students were hospitalized for observation at Kingman Community Hospital.

Most of the other students, ranging in age from 5 to 18, suffered bumps and bruises.

By late afternoon, the most badly injured bus passenger, a 12-year-old girl, was upgraded to serious condition at Via Christi Regional Medical Center-St. Francis campus. The 16-year-old pickup driver and his 14-year-old passenger were in serious condition at Wesley Medical Center, hospital officials said.

All the students were initially taken to Kingman Community Hospital, with the three most seriously hurt students then airlifted to Wichita, Tiller said. The six students hospitalized in Kingman were expected to be released by evening.

The crash occurred about 7:50 a.m. near an unmarked intersection about three miles south and two miles west of Kingman.

Kansas Highway Patrol Trooper Craig Presley said the northbound bus was struck by the eastbound pickup, spinning the pickup and sending the bus into a ditch, where it overturned and came to rest on its edge. Its body was separated from the frame.

The pickup's teen-age driver and a passenger were ejected, the patrol said. The bus driver was not seriously injured, and he called in the report of the accident. The older model bus was not equipped with seat belts for passengers.

Kingman is about 40 miles west of Wichita.

Services honor veterans, victims of Pearl Harbor

PEARL HARBOR, Hawaii — This sprawling naval base drew silent for one minute Thursday to mark the time 59 years ago that Japanese planes attacked the U.S. Pacific fleet and plunged the nation into World War II.

A moment of silence began at 7:55 a.m., creating a brilliant rainbow over Ford Island. It lasted until the American flag was raised five minutes later over the gleaming white USS Arizona Memorial during the Navy's annual commemorative ceremony.

About 240 survivors, veterans, dignitaries, military officials and guests attended the services on the memorial that straddles the battleship sunk in the attack, a tomb for about 1,000 of its crewmen.

The surprise attack on Pearl Harbor and other military bases on Oahu lasted two hours. The Japanese military sank or heavily damaged 21 ships, destroyed or damaged 323 aircraft, killed 2,388 people and wounded 1,178.

"It's very emotional. It truly is," said Woodrow Wilson Derby, an 82-year-old retired math teacher from San Diego who was a petty officer on the USS Nevada. "The bad memories have gone out of my mind. I'm just glad to be alive."

The service aboard the USS Arizona Memorial included prayers, 40 wreath presentations, a missing man formation flyover by Hawaii Air National Guard F-15 jets, a 21-gun salute and echo taps.

On Wednesday, three Japanese pilots who flew in the attack and a dozen American survivors of the raid shook hands and embraced during a reconciliation ceremony aboard the Battleship Missouri Memorial.

Another World War II battleship — the USS Wisconsin, launched exactly two years after the Pearl Harbor attack — was towed to Norfolk, Va., for its new assignment as a floating museum. The Wisconsin served in World War II, the Korean War and the Persian Gulf War. The ship was retired three times and last was decommissioned in 1991.

Services took place across the country, from Alabama to West Virginia and in New York City, where veterans gathered for a memorial on the battleship Intrepid.

Professor to retire after 30 years with university

By AMBER CUNNINGHAM
Kansas State Collegian

Col. Stan G. Weir of the U.S. Air Force began his career 30 years ago in the K-State Air Force ROTC and will end his career as a K-State professor of aerospace studies.

Weir is retiring from the Air Force and K-State this semester.

"To be able to come back to K-State after a 30-year career has been wonderful," Weir said. "I have enjoyed working with so many wonderful people at K-State."

Not only is Weir a professor of aerospace studies, but he also is the head of the Department of Aerospace Studies and the commander of detachment 270 Air Force ROTC. He teaches the freshman and sophomore AFROTC classes.

Weir was commissioned into the Air Force on Dec. 27, 1970, while at K-State. He said his greatest joy is having been able to start and end his career at K-State.

"In my time in the Air Force I've come across K-Staters who are proud of being from K-State," Weir said. "We've got people serving all over the world from K-State."

Weir has served all over the United States and in Italy. Weir said his role in the Air Force has been training, leading and educating people. Weir also is a B-52 pilot in strategic air command.

Those who have worked with Weir said they have enjoyed their time together on the job.

Lorri Holloway, a secretary for AFROTC for 21 years, said he is great to work for.

"He is very understanding and relates to students and staff real well," Holloway said. "He knows what's going on."

Cadet Lt. Col. Katherine Hetland, senior in mathematics, said Weir is a great role model for cadets.

"He is somebody I can talk to if I need anything," she said. "He takes the time and really cares about us."

Tom Roberts, associate dean of the College of Engineering, said he was Weir's roommate in the 1960s.

"I remember him getting ready to go to the football games," Roberts said. "He was a yell-leader, and his enthusiasm and love for K-State carried on for 30 years."

Roberts also said Weir has done amazing things for ROTC.

"He integrated ROTC into the main campus," Roberts said. "Even more, he integrated ROTC into parts of leadership and campus activities."

Facilities staffer retires after more than 2 decades of service at K-State

By ERIN DEHN
Kansas State Collegian

Pauline Barr is closing the curtain on a career that has spanned more than two decades. A staff member of the Division of University Physical Facilities' Custodial Services, Barr is one star Nichols Hall doesn't want to lose.

"She has been here forever. She is warm and wonderful and a close friend to us," said Charlotte MacFarland, associate professor of theater.

On Monday, Barr will report for work for one hour, and then sign her retirement papers. Prior to her 16 years at Nichols Hall, Barr worked in Thompson Hall, All Faiths Chapel and at a number of graduations and football games.

"I was here [K-State] 24 years on Oct. 17, and I've never been late," Barr said. "My job means so much to me."

"I can always be to work on time, but never to church on time."

Barr's work day begins at 6 every morning. Because of a knee injury, her eight-hour days were cut down to five hours, but that hasn't stopped this "queen of clean" from accomplishing her tasks.

"I'm pretty fast to move around," said Barr, who will be 75 next month. "I have 50 offices, and I do every one of those offices every day. I mop and clean bathrooms every day. I run my hallway twice a day to make it look pretty good for when I come back the next morning."

Her commitment to the job is proof of her strong work ethic.

"There's nothing about this job I don't like," Barr said. "If I'm working and something happened and I died, I'd die doing what I enjoy."

Barr said that more than anything, she is going to miss the people she has met throughout the years.

"They all are so nice," she said. "I really care and look out for these people."

Perhaps that is her greatest chore, taking care of the people who appreciate her the most.

MacFarland recalled an instance when Barr proved her dedication.

MacFarland was out of town when her office flooded. Barr took out each rug and cleaned them, stacked the books and salvaged all that could be saved. MacFarland returned to a clean office.

"She's a great worker," MacFarland said. "To other people, it's just a job. To Pauline, it's her building."

It's a building Barr said she can cover with her eyes closed — something that has been tested from time to time.

"Sometimes a storm would come and the lights would go out," Barr said. "So I'd carry a flashlight. I'd clean the blackboard holding up the flashlight."

When co-workers voiced their concerns about Barr's safety in such situations, she said, "The good Lord will take care of me."

Barr remembered an instance when her safety could have been in jeopardy.

She was cleaning when a woman approached her and asked where the nearest doughnut shop was located. Barr responded and continued with her work. After a series of questions and small talk, the woman disappeared, and so did Barr's purse.

Her lunch was in her purse, and when the woman exited the bathroom with her mouth full, Barr knew she was the culprit.

"I said, 'Honey, give me my purse,'" Barr said.

The woman declined.

"Then I said, 'If you'd ask me to give you two or three dollars, I'm good-hearted,'" Barr said.

The woman grabbed Barr and threatened to kick her.

"I flipped her, I got down on her," Barr said. "I said, 'What is your problem, lady? I don't want to have to hurt you.'"

The police were called to the scene and took the woman into custody. Barr decided not to press charges.

"I said, 'That woman's sick. She's got to be messed up,'" Barr said.

Barr's scuffle had grabbed the attention of others in the building.

"They told me, 'Well, Pauline, we need to find you a place where you can be a bouncer. The way you handled that woman, you could handle those drunks,'" Barr said with a laugh.

Barr has dealt with other difficult periods in her life, from one of her sons' fight with cancer to her mother's battle with Alzheimer's. But she said she rarely takes time off.

"I'm not one of those people who gets a little cough and stays home," she said. "I just need to stay busy."

During her knee injury, Barr ran out of share leave. When she returned to work but couldn't complete the entire eight-hour shift, the faculty and staff of Nichols Hall pooled their leave together to give to Barr, to allow her to work five-hour shifts.

"We're going to miss her," said Bill Schenck-Hamlin, associate professor of speech communication, theater and dance. "She talks to us about her day and we talk to her about our day. She doesn't just clean up. She's a friend."

Retirement for Barr means additional spare time, time she said she'll spend volunteering at The Salvation Army, continuing involvement with her church and playing bingo, though she plans to return to Nichols Hall in February for temporary work.

This afternoon, the faculty and staff of Nichols Hall is honoring Barr for her years of smiles and dedication with a party.

"I come here at six and leave at 11 a.m. The party starts at three," Barr said. "I'll go home, get dressed and come back all dressed up. I told them there'll be a lot of tears."

MacFarland said that while she is glad for Barr and her family, she cannot imagine the building without her.

"Here's a person who is a custodian, who has done just as much for K-State as anyone," she said. "She's just a miracle."

Dear Santa...

Dear Santa,
All I want for Christmas is a diploma. Is that too much to ask?

Sincerely, Reed

Dear Santa,

I hope to continue my happy streak, Santa. Please give me a job after graduation that won't take me too far from friends and family, but far enough to find a whole new dating pool.

I swear I've been good (but I've been known to be naughty), Jenn

Dear Santa,

If you can find it in your heart to either put Dave Matthews or Elvis Presley in my stocking it would be a pleasant surprise. And if you could somehow work miracles and make me not break too many body parts on my ski trip, it would be awesome.

Love, Erin

Dear Santa,

All I want for Christmas is a job that pays more than $20,000 a year and a car that actually moves. Oh, and gas that's less than $1.20 per gallon would be nice. And the elimination of world hunger. Thanks.

Yours truly, Sara

Dear Santa,

Please give me the patience to put up with my parents over winter break.

Love, Sarah

Dear Santa,

All I want for Christmas is the lead singer of a rock band. I have several in mind from which to choose. And I'd also be appreciative for the strength to get through one more semester of school before graduation.

Thanks, Kristen

Dear Santa,

I have simple needs — books, pens, caffeine, sleep and a toy for my ferret, in no particular order. Please take the E staff off the "naughty" list — we've been good. Real good.

Yr. Obl. Srvt., Becky

Dear Santa,

For Christmas I want a duckie, a horsie and a doggie. Oh yeah, I'll leave the door open in Emporia because my parents' house doesn't have a chimney. It might be hard to fit the horsie down there anyway.

Love, Jamie

Dear Santa,

If you could find some way to have the K-State punt team snap its ridiculous three-game streak of getting one blocked, that would be awfully nice. I know that might be a lot to ask for a New Year's Day bowl game, but a guy can always hope.

Thanks, Derek

I can't ride my bike on the sidewalk, yet I can get ran over by one of them K-State golf carts. That's fair.

Yeah, I would just like to say that it is a great thing Kansas State has all those 24-hour computing labs, especially when you have to go to three of them to find one that has a decent printer that can print off one piece of damn paper. Thanks.

If you thought learning the insides of a squid was pointless, try the veins and arteries of a rat. When am I ever going to need to know that?

Gee, I'm glad I have so many finals and projects on dead week, because I'd almost forgotten how much fun it was to stay up all damn night.

I just wanted to congratulate the men's basketball team. You shot 57.1 percent from the free-throw line, while the women shot 62.5 percent from the three-point line. Way to go, Cats.

I would like to graduate with K-State with no regrets. Therefore, Aaron Lockett, will you marry me?

Finding Santa

Kris Kringle transcends commonly held perspective

I remember when I used to wait up for Santa on Christmas Eve.

Being careful not to breathe too heavily, or even too much, so when he was on our rooftop, trying to get down the chimney, I could hear him.

One of my favorite things used to be setting out cookies and milk for Santa and carrots for his reindeer. I truly hoped he would enjoy all of the Chips Ahoy and Vitamin D milk that I left for him.

This year, I want Dave Matthews and Elvis Presley to be in my stocking, but I realize that even Santa sometimes cannot work miracles.

I am longing to be done with my finals and go home to be with my family. I cannot wait to be able to sleep in my own bed and wake up without an alarm clock, except for when I am forced to.

I can't wait to sing karaoke with my three older brothers and eat supper, that isn't macaroni or burnt, with my parents.

It will be a time when we can discuss things other than class schedules and stresses. When we can decorate the Christmas tree with homemade ornaments that are far more beautiful than anything store bought.

Everyone keeps asking me what I want for Christmas. I honestly don't want any presents under the tree, but instead to be able to enjoy the company of those around the tree.

However, there is a present I want for everyone around me. To once again believe in the magic of the season.

I want to have the cynics refrain from questioning and instead enjoy the magic of the holiday. I also want people to start listening for the footsteps on their rooftops instead of assuming that this wonderful man doesn't exist.

Santa is not the man at the mall. He is only a representation of him, a messenger of some sort. Santa doesn't necessarily exist in one person, but instead in the kindness of all people.

He can be found when people give without expecting anything in return, when people don't think about how much money they have to spend, but instead find creative ways to express their love and true feelings and when people put others before themselves.

Santa is a reminder of all the people I love and care about. The kindness and sweetness of my dad, the laughter of my mom, the happiness of my brothers, the smiles of my friends and the innocence of all of the wonderful children I know.

He is the reminder of the stranger on the street and someone you love dearly, all wrapped into one being.

Others claim this jolly old man only arrives once a year. That one night, on an annual basis, he works all night long delivering toys. That also cannot be completely true. For the spirit of him is found wherever there is unconditional love, kindness, compassion and giving. While that is what is focused on during the holiday season, it can be found all throughout the year. If it wasn't at least a notion of a possibility throughout the entire year this world would be far too drab and dark.

It is funny because the holiday season, for whatever religion or belief, is supposed to serve as a reminder to be with loved ones and family, yet people tend to get so stressed out that they don't enjoy their family gatherings. They are stressed out about not finding the perfect gift or preparing the wrong kind of meal.

my view
ERIN SCHNEWEIS

KELLIE FARRELL/Collegian

Some also claim that the season has become even more materialistic, but I don't believe this is so.

There are certain things that no price tag can be placed upon. Things like making sugar cookies and my personal favorite — putting the angel on the tree, placing the leftover bows on the heads of my family members and building snowwomen outside, weather permitting.

As for this Dec. 24, I will be waiting patiently to hear his footsteps. And if he wants to stick around and celebrate my birthday on Christmas Day, maybe this year I will give him more than some Vitamin D milk — maybe the jolly old man and I might kick back and drink a Bud Light.

Bureaucracy primary subject of KSU learning

I am 56 minutes short.

For 56 minutes, I will pay $1,159 and receive an F on my transcript.

I made a mistake. I was wrong. I thought I needed nine hours of lab time to pass my Spanish class, but I needed 10. I went to lab. I spent nine hours and four minutes in the lab this semester. I also attended class for 50 minutes three days a week, turned in my assignments and earned A's and B's on my tests, compositions and oral interviews. But I will fail the class.

I sought help from every angle. I spoke to anyone who might be able to help me but received the same answer each time, "I'm sorry. There is nothing I can do."

Because I pay out-of-state tuition, this mistake will cost me $1,159. I will take the course again next semester and do all the same assignments, tests, compositions and this time I will go to lab 56 extra minutes.

Will I learn any new material? No. Will I have a better understanding of the language? No. But I will understand university policy. If the mission of this institution is to teach bureaucracy, then mission accomplished.

Lab policies are set within specific departments before each semester and outlined in the syllabi. I respect that. However, these policies must be fair and they must be consistently communicated in class and in the syllabi. A student who blows off language lab time should not receive credit for a four-credit-hour course. But shouldn't a student who has obviously tried to meet course requirements be given an opportunity to rectify their mistakes? I have been willing to make up my lab hours, but it was more than a week after my absence when I realized nine hours wasn't enough.

A policy to help students in my situation may be to allow students to make up lab hours by spending twice the amount of missed time in the lab. I would also have been willing to do an extra composition or an assignment.

Another possible solution in my situation would have been to take a zero in the 10 percent of the course grade for the Language Learning Center. The equivalent class in the French department leaves an instructor to determine a fair judgment. One class this semester allowed students who had at least five hours of lab time to pass the class, but receive a zero for that portion of their grade.

Again, I made the mistake. I do not expect to rectify the situation without consequences. I do, however, believe the consequences are severe. I had hoped to find a solution that would keep the failing grade off my transcripts and prevent the high cost of paying for another four credit hours. I have admitted my own fault from the beginning and did not request special treatment — only a solution to the problem of a student who is struggling to afford an education from this institution.

So I will pay for my actions. I will fail a class that I have worked so hard on this semester. I have learned a great deal from the class, but also from the system. I hope future students in this situation will have options that will give them consequences for their mistakes and punishments more appropriate for their short failings.

Lasting legacies at college near impossible to create

This is my legacy.

Like many students who will be graduating tomorrow, I have spent a little bit of time contemplating how I want to be remembered once I move on to the next life — the real world.

This legacy is far less important than the one we leave when we die, but it still can weigh heavy on your mind, trying to determine what part of the past four years of your life will be remembered.

The sad part about a college legacy is its short lifespan. Because students are here only a few years — with some exceptions — few legacies have any chance of surviving.

If I'm lucky, my friends will continue to mention my name in stories or while reliving glory days gone by.

But that will not last. Even if I have had a profound effect on a few members of the freshman class while I was here — not likely — they will only be around four more years.

That means a college legacy has a maximum lifespan of perhaps four years. Sure, someone might remember your name, but they will not know about you or anything you did while you were here.

That is the pattern of college life. You are here, you enjoy yourself and you leave. Within a few short years, you are forgotten.

Nothing at K-State survives more than a college generation.

How many freshmen could tell you that Manhattan

Avenue used to be a four-lane street, one where drivers could hit bikers and pedestrians without having to veer into a special bike lane or stare at a blinking yellow pedestrian light?

This is one change that has occurred during my years at K-State. Others include the expansion of KSU Stadium, the demolition of any patch of grass with the nerve to attempt to survive in the vicinity of the K-State Student Union, the completion of Hale Library and the construction of Ackert Hall.

These are a few of the obvious physical changes that have taken place in the past few years. How many freshmen can recall campus before these changes took place? Probably a few. But by the time this year's freshmen are gone, the idea that there was once grass on campus will probably seem absurd.

In the same way, graduating seniors soon will become oblivious to the impending changes. How many of us will be taken aback to see the Senior Sidewalk put in, or a rock wall built around campus (perhaps to protect us from invading Mongolians), or the new Alumni Center completed? OK, the last one will probably never actually happen — it was supposed to be done by this time, yet a few saplings are all that occupy its space.

But all of these show just how short the college memory is.

The same thing happened at the end of our high school days. My senior year, after capturing my second-consecutive Topeka city race-walk championship, I was confident people would remember me.

Nope. After a few years of college, however, I am not concerned with a high school legacy.

Similarly, after a few years in the real world, I probably won't be concerned with a college legacy.

But for now, I want to be sure I am not totally forgotten by those people who I have grown to admire and to call friends.

Guest columnist mistaken in view, should have done further research

Editor,

Most people understand that research comes before thesis and truth comes before sensationalism. Unfortunately, Erin Downey Howerton failed on both counts in her guest view Thursday. Howerton would have you believe that Varney's Book Store and Streetside Records would be associated with a publication that advocates the degradation of women. That is patently false.

In fact, both Varney's and Streetside Records are active members of the community and have provided financial and other resources to groups such as Men Against Rape Society, The Crisis Center Inc. and the United Way, to name a few.

Both of us couldn't agree more with Howerton's stance on misogyny and racism. We regret that she chose to operate on hearsay instead of fact. By advocating a boycott of our respective businesses, Howerton is asking for our ultimate demise. We believe and know our actions within the community will indicate that Howerton's claim of distribution is not true.

In closing, we invite Howerton and all others to join us in continued service to the community by joining us for the seventh year of the Streetside Records Charity gift wrap booth from Saturday to Dec. 26. As always, the proceeds from this gift wrap will benefit The Crisis Center Inc., a keystone of this community's support system for battered women and children. Online service buys books

By APRIL MIDDLETON
Kansas State Collegian

With finals straight ahead, many students will be ready to ditch their old books and buy new ones.

Wildcat Connection, a recently launched online ad service, www.wildcatconnection.com, hopes to make the book buying and selling process more friendly for students.

"Students pay so much money for books each semester and when they sell them back they get so little," Matt Phipps, owner of Wildcat Connection, said. "The central idea behind this site is to organize a central location for students to buy and sell books. They can save a lot of money like this."

Phipps, senior majoring in management information systems, said during his time at K-State he was able to get ideas of what students wanted. His site, he said, is centered around those needs.

Wildcat Connection allows students to buy and sell things such as electronics, furniture and books.

Phipps said it's hard to tell what areas will be used most since the business was launched this semester.

"It's kind of in the air right now," Phipps said. "I haven't had much time to see what the market is going to look like. Books, though, will be a big interest at this time of the semester."

Kendra Ceule, junior in public relations, has an account set up through Wildcat Connection. She plans to use the site to buy and sell textbooks at the end of the semester.

"The site sounds like a great idea. It will allow us to do more even trades," Ceule said. "Once more students hear about it, it's going to be a great outlet."

Phipps said he came up with his business plan and worked with a company in Wichita to get the site up and running.

Students looking to sell items on Wildcat Connection must create an account that includes basic information. Phipps said it might seem like a lot of personal information, but it is necessary to ensure integrity.

Phipps said the strength of the business is that there is no middle-man involved in buying or selling.

"Buyers can browse the site and if they find something that interests them they can contact the seller through the site," Phipps said. "It's completely interactive."

There is no charge for browsing the site or creating an account. The company works on a credit system.

In order to make a listing on the site, sellers must purchase credits. Credits can be purchased for $2 each through the site. The amount of credits required to list an item is based on the selling price.

"It sounds complicated, but the site will guide you through any questions you have," Phipps said. "You buy as many credits as you like. Those that aren't used get banked for future use."

Items are listed for a period of 21 days.

C.J. Wadesworth, junior in sociology, has listed an item to sell on Wildcat Connection. He said the site is a great convenience to students.

"There's no other local outlet that provides this kind of service," Wadesworth said. "Once it really picks up and starts going it's going to be great."

Other services Phipps hopes to include to make buying and selling on the site easier is the ability to upload pictures with classified listings. Phipps said he has many ideas that will transform the site from an online classified business to a complete service to students.

The newest addition to the site is a section that will feature area specials. Students will be able to receive quick access to specials at local bars and restaurants.

Freshman Carl Jensen led the K-State volleyball team with 24 kills against Pepperdine last Saturday. The victory gave the Wildcats their first trip to the Sweet 16. K-State will play Wisconsin tonight in Madison. Below: Carl Jensen digs a ball in the Wildcats' match against the Baylor Bears on Sept. 16.

POISED PLAYER

Freshman outside hitter comes through in postseason

By MICHAEL NOLL

Kansas State Collegian

When K-State's volleyball team advanced to its first ever Sweet 16 by defeating Pepperdine last Saturday, the match's star, freshman Carl Jensen, could have celebrated in several ways.

After leading the squad with 24 kills, she could have (A) jumped around screaming, (B) cried tears of joy or (C) said a prayer of thanks for her fine performance. Instead, however, Jensen chose to (D) ask her coach if they could practice on her weakest area in the match.

"I think Carl's unique in that she gets done with this match, and we're going to the round of 16, and the first thing she says to me — she just smiles and says, 'Hey, can we work on blocking this week?' She just wants to keep getting better," head coach Jim McLaughlin said. "That's just the type of person she is."

Such dedication might sound almost a bit extreme, but it's the kind of mindset that will allow the outside hitter to capitalize on her potential, McLaughlin said.

"I think, with a few exceptions, the greatest at anything make the greatest commitment, and we don't have any exceptions on our team," he said. "We need to work very hard and do the right things the right way."

So far, Jensen has made a great commitment, outside hitter Liz Wegner said.

"It just shows how she's just a really poised player. She picks up the game very well, and she has worked so hard," she said. "She never gives up, and that's shown in the way she's been playing lately, and she's just going to keep getting better."

"She's just a freshman, so I don't know what more you can say about it other than she's going to be a really amazing player. I can't wait to see how she does in the future."

Indeed, the possibilities do seem endless for the true freshman, but during one mid-season stretch, it looked as if that future might be put on hold. After starting the first 13 matches of the season, Jensen suddenly was MIA, appearing in just one game in a five-match stretch.

"It was frustrating at times," Jensen said, "but coming in as a freshman, you can't expect to be out there on the court all the time. Your turn will come, and if you just keep working hard, it will happen."

In this case, Jensen needed to keep working on breaking the habits she had learned at Fowler (Colo.) High School.

"I was just kind of out there off what I learned in high school. I just threw everything together so quickly, and then I needed to take each part of my game and break it

Cats to face Wisconsin in NCAA Sweet 16

By DEREK BOSS

Kansas State Collegian

Head coach Jim McLaughlin is fully aware of his volleyball team's record-breaking performance last Saturday against Pepperdine, sending the Cats to the NCAA Sweet 16 for the first time in history.

More importantly, though, he knows "why" and "how" his squad accomplished such a feat.

"They had the chance to distinguish themselves as a K-State team — and K-State's a great place — so that's an opportunity, and they went out and just lit it up," McLaughlin said. "I've never seen a team play that hard."

"They just went out and said, 'Hey, we're not going to try to win, we're going to win it all,' and that's kind of been our attitude."

Not a bad attitude to have, especially with the heightened confidence level the Cats are playing with at this stage of the

QUICK FACTS

■ K-State is coming off a 15-7, 15-4, 6-15, 15-9 win over Loyola-Chicago in NCAA Tournament first-round action Friday night, while upsetting fourth-seeded Pepperdine 19-17, 15-13, 10-15, 15-3 on Saturday.

■ Wisconsin heads into tonight's match after posting a 15-1, 15-0, 15-3 shellacking of Bucknell and a 15-13, 14-16, 15-5, 15-6 win over Northern Iowa this past weekend. The Badgers were led by 6-foot-2 middle blocker and Big Ten Co-Player of the Year Sherita Livingston, who averaged 23 kills in Wisconsin's last two outings, hitting .619 and .467, respectively, in first- and second-round play.

■ The Wildcats and Badgers have faced one common opponent this season in Colorado. K-State earned a pair of three-game victories over the Buffaloes this year, while Wisconsin also defeated CU in three games on Sept. 8.

■ K-State is 12-27 all-time against teams from the Big Ten Conference, although the Cats haven't faced a Big Ten opponent since dropping a three-game match at then-No. 2 and eventual national champion Penn State on Sept. 11, 1999.

Last meeting — K-State won, 3-2 (Sept. 8, 1995) at the First Tier Challenge in Lincoln, Neb.

Senior standout

Middle blocker Kelle Branting is playing in her final NCAA Tournament at K-State. The senior said it's incredible what the volleyball team has accomplished since she arrived.

"Being a first of two things at Kansas State — beating Nebraska for the first time in history and going to the Sweet 16 for the first time in history — it's been a great career for me and just a great way to top it off," she said.

In fact, Branting recalled that K-State volleyball's potential to succeed played a large part in her decision to come to Manhattan.

"I knew it would take a while to build, but it really feels good for me going out as a senior knowing this is the best K-State has ever been, and I've been here for four years and I've helped make that happen," she said. "So that's what really means the most to me here."

Confidence boosts team's chances for Final 4 berth

Cocky might be too harsh of a term, but needless to say, the K-State volleyball team is playing with a ton of confidence right now.

Whether that's good or bad heading into tonight's

Sweet 16 matchup with Wisconsin remains to be seen, but nevertheless, Monday afternoon gave me a feeling — a premonition if you will — about K-State's NCAA Tournament chances.

Don't ask me why, but the Cats' shot at reaching the Final Four next week isn't as far-fetched as one might think.

It just hit me Monday like a ton of bricks.

There I was, sitting in the volleyball meeting room over at Ahearn Field House, waiting for the press conference to begin. There was no pre-conference meal offered (I'm not quite as spoiled by Cat volleyball as I am by football, but just give it time), so I just sat and listened.

About nine or 10 volleyball players were scattered throughout the room, and I couldn't help but develop an overwhelming sense of confidence in that team, that program.

Every word that came from the woman's mouths was so articulate it scared me. Even the freshmen in the room were talking like aging veterans. They simply were ready to play.

They'll need to be ready to play in facing No. 4 Wisconsin tonight, but I don't doubt head coach Jim McLaughlin will have them focused. The 1999 Big 12 Coach of the Year knows what's at stake, and he's made his goal perfectly clear — to win a national championship.

Now, he'll tell you he doesn't know exactly when that will transpire, but looking at his progress so far, it could be much sooner than expected.

When McLaughlin arrived at K-State in 1997, he talked about a five-year plan, as each successive season will see improvement.

Right now, he's far ahead of schedule.

During McLaughlin's tenure, he's coached K-State to a sixth place finish in the Big 12 in '97, fifth in '98 and now a tie for second in 2000. Four seasons ago, McLaughlin's squad lost in the first-round of the NCAA, then they fell in the second round the last two years, and now the Cats are headed to the Sweet 16.

"We're making progress," the Cat coach said. "Our ultimate goal is to win a national title. When? I don't know, but we just want to keep getting a little bit better."

However, if the Cats get any better right now, look out, Wisconsin, as well as their Elite 8 opponent (the winner of UCLA/Pacific).

So, although many of you think booking your flight to Richmond, Va., and the NCAA Final Four might be a little premature — think again.

I'm telling you, I've got contingency in this K-State volleyball team. They're well-coached, they have tremendous poise and they're unstoppable if they don't lose focus. Right now is the perfect time to peak, and that's exactly what McLaughlin's squad is doing.

Don't be surprised if you hear the Cats are headed to the East Coast next week. But hey — if that doesn't happen, look at the bright side. You didn't even have to wait on that five-year plan to see history in the making.

Fox squirrels, Sciurus niger, are the largest arboreal, or tree, squirrel. Fox squirrels are highly adapted for climbing trees, and fatal falls are rare. Adaptations for climbing trees include tough curved claws for climbing and they can leap considerable distances using powerful hindlimbs. Tails are used for balance when running and leaping between trees and they are held over the back of a resting animal.

Family adoption program seeking volunteers

By JENNIFER O'NEILL
Kansas State Collegian

It is the season of giving, and the Flint Hills Breadbasket is hard at work.

Since 1986, the Breadbasket has been host to an adopt-a-family program for needy families in Manhattan and Ogden during the holidays. This year, there are more than 900 families waiting to be adopted.

"For the last six years we've been able to say that our community and K-State have adopted each and every one of our families," said Shirley Bramhall, executive director of the Breadbasket. "All of our families' needs have been met."

Bramhall said she'd like to have all of the families spoken for by Dec. 22, but people can volunteer as late as Christmas Eve.

There are a variety of ways people can help out a family.

"People can be as involved in the process as much or as little as they want to be," she said.

Bramhall said a lot of people want to donate but do not have the extra time to go shopping.

One way to adopt a family is to go shopping for them, wrap the gifts and either deliver it to the family personally or drop it off at the Breadbasket for them to deliver.

If people want to remain anonymous or simply donate money, other volunteers will go shopping with the donation and deliver it to the family.

"We are very good about meeting both the donor and the clients' needs," she said.

K-State students are considered valuable volunteers, Bramhall said.

"College students bring so much energy to whatever they do — they have such a can-do attitude," she said. "When we're about to attack a task that's almost unsurmountable, they go at it."

The Horticulture Club, Mortar Board, the Department of Agronomy, Greek Affairs, the Society for Women Engineers and the K-State Union Bookstore are just a few organizations at K-State participating in the program.

The bookstore has adopted families for the past 10 years.

"We love it. It feels really good and that's the meaning of Christmas," said Jean Johnston, a cashier at the bookstore.

The bookstore also has set up an angel tree with the names of children from the Breadbasket program. People choose an angel off the tree and buy a book for the child. The donor receives a 25 percent discount off the book and the bookstore even wraps it and delivers it to the Breadbasket.

One of the best parts of volunteering at the Breadbasket is the people you meet.

"I don't know who has a better time, donors or the people who receive," Bramhall said.

The Breadbasket also is preparing its annual holiday food baskets. If people cannot afford to adopt a family, they can donate meats such as turkeys, chickens and hams. Cash donations also are accepted.

This Thanksgiving, the Breadbasket set a record — 2,000 food baskets were made and sent out to needy families.

The Breadbasket also is in need of recycled gift wrap, tape, ribbon and Christmas trees.

"We try to provide people with as normal a holiday as possible," Bramhall said.

People who are considering volunteering should know they have a variety of ages of children to choose from that could make it financially easier.

Babies and toddlers have less expensive wish lists than teen-agers in high school, she said.

It all depends on how much you can afford. Any time or money people can give is worth it, Bramhall said.

"The reason I volunteer is because the community has given me so much," she said. "It's a wonderful place to live and a wonderful place to send my kids to school."

If people are interested in adopting a family for the holidays or volunteering in other ways, they can call the Flint Hills Breadbasket.

"You really get an opportunity to come together for a common cause," Bramhall said. "I can't think of anything more rewarding than that."

down and work on it more," Jensen said. "That's kind of what I did when I wasn't starting, just developing every aspect of my game better, and now it's all coming together."

The effort paid off, as Jensen regained playing time and has started 12 of K-State's past 14 matches. In addition to her physical skills, though, Jensen has improved markedly in her confidence as well, Wegner said.

"She feels more confident in what she's doing because she's able to talk about it more and ask more questions. You hear her asking a little more than what she used to," she said. "She has really grown through the year, and you can see that in just the way she talks to us now and how she plays. Her experience is starting to add up."

That experience is something Jensen won't take for granted.

"It's an awesome feeling, and it's neat being a part of this program that's making history at K-State," Jensen said.

The season has been a rewarding one for Jensen, improving as she has, but Jensen said she still has improvements to make.

"They're definitely coming along better," Jensen said of her skill levels, "but my blocking still has a ways to go for sure."

season, junior outside hitter Liz Wegner said.

"We're just really confident in the way we're playing and we've gotten so much better since the beginning of the year," she said. "If we play well, we can compete with anyone in the NCAA Tournament."

Friday will be that next test, as 17th-ranked K-State will face No. 4 Wisconsin in the NCAA Midwest Regional Semifinals.

The Cats moved up seven spots to No. 17 in the national polls after first- and second-round wins in the postseason, tying the team's highest national ranking this year, as K-State was selected 17th in the Aug. 14th pre-season poll.

Meanwhile, the Badgers, Big Ten Conference champions with a 18-2 league mark, are the top-seed in the Midwest. A Cat victory Friday night would advance them to the Elite 8 at 7 p.m. Saturday, meeting the winner of the No. 7 Pacific (28-3)/No. 11 UCLA (24-7) match.

But first things first, K-State needs to be ready for a high caliber opponent like the Badgers, junior setter Disney Bronnenberg said, a task the Cats are prepared to face.

"I don't think that scares anybody. It doesn't get any easier after the first and second rounds, but at the same time, we got hot just like we needed to and I think the momentum's going to drive us against Wisconsin," she said.

That momentum intensified most recently in Malibu, Calif., last weekend, as K-State downed its second-round opponent, host and then-No. 15 Pepperdine, in four games. In fact, the Cats were so emotional after the victory, Bronnenberg said she can't even recall McLaughlin's post-game speech after the match.

"You know, we were all kind of screaming a lot, we didn't really notice," she said.

However, senior middle blocker Kelle Branting was able to piece together the coach's response to the win, the 500th all-time for the Wildcat volleyball program.

"All he really said was, 'I'm proud of you guys. This is great, this is a first for K-State and you guys get to be a part of it — we all get to be a part of it,'" Branting said. "Then he said, 'Let's not stop here, let's just keep going.'"

And why shouldn't the Cats listen to McLaughlin — he's been right all along this season. Branting said, stressing the importance of being a great team by the time November and December roll around.

"He's been preaching it from day one. He knew going in that we were going to be a very young team, and it was going to take a while for us to mature as a team and gel together," Branting said.

"It's a long process and there's been some rocky times, but the good teams pull through and we did. We're peaking at the right time and we feel really good going in."

Nevertheless, Wegner knows there's always a flip side to the coin of confidence.

"If you're a little too overconfident you can almost let-down and not play up to your ability," she said, "but yet, you have to have a certain confidence in what you're doing is right, that it will work, and if you just stick to it, it'll all pan out in the end."

Pan out it will, as long as K-State's veterans continue to lead the team through the tournament, McLaughlin said.

"They've got to carry the emotional load, and I thought our upperclassmen did a good job of that," the Cat coach said of last weekend's first- and second-round victories. "Kelle and Lisa Mimick — really you should have seen them — they had the eye of the tiger. They were growling the whole time and they never let up."

Regardless, K-State will have one definite thing going for them tonight, McLaughlin said — pride.

"Pride gets the whole thing going, so when we're wearing purple around we're kind of fired up."

Pageant PREPARATIONS

Contestants gear up for fraternity-sponsored Miss Black and Gold Pageant

By ALYSON RALETZ
Kansas State Collegian

Strutting across the stage to the smooth sounds of rhythm and blues, the contestants have been perfecting every move to prepare for the Miss Black and Gold Pageant.

This is the second year Alpha Phi Alpha fraternity has sponsored the show, said Robyn Reed, senior in social sciences and economics.

"This year's pageant is much more elaborate than last year," Reed said. "There are more props and lighting. It is generally a more theatrical and a lot jazzier. It's unique to the African-American culture and the way we do things."

The pageant is sponsored by Alpha Phi Alpha every year to showcase African-American women and their achievements and intelligence. The pageant is open to anyone but is directed toward African-American women on predominately white campuses.

Reed is the reigning Miss Black and Gold at K-State. She also won the regional competitions, made up of 13 states from the Midwest.

She said the most important thing contestants should remember when competing in the pageant is how they portray themselves to the audience.

"If you portray yourself like you are only concerned with beauty, that is how the judges will see you," she said. "Don't feel like someone is gawking at your body. You are up there displaying the awesomeness of you."

Missy Herron, junior in marketing and international business, will be competing tonight for the crown. Before she joined the pageant, she said she was wary of being a part of something that could be disrespectful toward women.

"I wasn't too sure, at first, of women parading themselves," Herron said.

"Then I realized that your body is a gift God has given you."

"Other people may think it's degrading, but the pageant is not about them," she said. "It's about each one of us and how we've grown through the experience."

The 12 contestants have been practicing since late September, said Daron Fowler, pageant coordinator and junior in apparel textile design.

Miss Black and Gold is different from other pageants because it is not a beauty pageant, he said.

"It's a scholarship pageant," he said.

"It's based on intelligence versus body. The judges concentrate on how they carry themselves."

He said the winner of the Miss Black and Gold pageant wins a $300 scholarship. She also becomes an auxiliary member of the Alpha Phi Alpha community service committee.

The women are judged in several categories. They are judged during their prepageant interview. They compete in business wear, talent, swim wear, evening gown and question-and-answer portions of the evening.

They also are judged on their amount of ticket sales, sponsor support and their grade point averages.

"This pageant is an opportunity to display the intelligence and beauty of African-American women at K-State," Fowler said.

This year's contestants are an overall fun and outgoing group of women, Herron said.

"We're all competing against each other, but we're willing to help each other," she said.

The event is an excellent way for K-State to get involved with the recruitment of minority women, Reed said.

"It helps us to reach out to the entire campus and celebrate African-American women," she said. "We ask them to come tonight and celebrate with us."

Bed and breakfast welcomes holiday guests

By SHANNON MARSHALL
Kansas State Collegian

A blanket of snow covers the gables and eaves of the Victorian home on Houston Street, reminding passers-by of Christmas scenes of a bygone era.

Inside, firelight dances spiritedly across the rich wine-colored walls of the front room, its warmth a welcome for many a travel-weary visitor who will, for a short period, call The Morning Star Bed and Breakfast home.

Although The Morning Star was established in Manhattan by Bill and Laurie Pieper a little over four years ago, this is its first year at the new address at 617 Houston St.

"We loved being in the bed and breakfast business, and we've met some really wonderful people. So we decided to sell the old house and move into a larger home," Laurie Pieper said.

Instead of decorating the house with traditional Victorian pieces, the couple chose to create an ambience of warmth and comfort that would make visitors feel at home. Caramel-colored overstuffed leather sofas, chairs and ottomans are arranged invitingly around the front room.

"It is such a compliment to us when one of our guests will come downstairs in their bathrobe and watch TV or read," Laurie Pieper said. "That tells us they feel comfortable, as they would in their own home."

Each guest room is accompanied by a spacious bathroom equipped with a jacuzzi and 100 percent cotton towels and bathrobes for guests. Laurie Pieper said she and her husband wanted their guests to enjoy the best quality possible.

"Each bed also has all-cotton sheets and a down comforter and down pillows," she said. "It's nice to snuggle up to."

To properly accommodate each guest, each room also is equipped with its own phone line and data port for business travelers.

Christmas decorations have begun to appear around the house as well.

Stairwell bannisters are accented by gilt-tipped floral bows, and decorative Christmas figurines have been placed around the front room.

"We are excited to put the tree up," Pieper said. "It will be decorated with a few personal ornaments from our family, but the majority of the ornaments will be different star ornaments that we have received and collected over the years."

She said guests send her different star ornaments every year, including ones made of crystal, wood, sterling silver, gold and velvet.

"We have a number of guests who return each year. They call to wish us a happy Thanksgiving, we send each other Christmas cards," Laurie Pieper said. "It's like having a big extended family."

She said several of these guests return each year for Christmas.

"We serve an enormous breakfast every day, but on Christmas Eve I bake an Italian bread called panettone and serve it Christmas morning," she said. "It's a yeast bread with fruits in it. It's very festive."

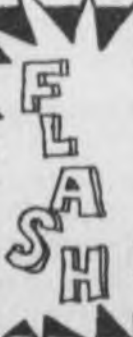

Her mother, Anne Pieper, is visiting Manhattan for the holidays and said she is not the only parent who visits The Morning Star.

"We have so many repeat parents who visit," she said. "It seems as though once they come, they come back to stay here again and again."

Manhattan site of national baseball tourney for under-14 next summer

By DAN SMITH

Kansas State Collegian

Baseball fever will seize Manhattan this summer when the hopes and dreams of hundreds of players from 17 states converge Aug. 3-8 on the Little Apple to take part in the 2001 NBC World Series.

Manhattan Baseball Association president Steve Disbrow and coach Vern Henricks worked together with Manhattan's Area Sports Council to secure the under-14 event earlier this year after outbidding several other regional locations.

"There's no question that the 17 states that play NBC baseball will have the goal of coming to Manhattan in August to compete for the World Series," Henricks said. "It virtually is just like the College World Series."

Between 20 and 25 teams from around the country will take part in next summer's event, which is at the Wayne Norvell Complex in Manhattan.

Henricks expects this year's tournament to be one of the best in recent history due to Kansas' position as a baseball haven in the Midwest.

"We feel like the community of Manhattan has really embraced sports as an economic development venue," Henricks said. "We have great facilities here, and the city is expanding them, putting in new bleachers and dugouts there. That typically isn't the case everywhere we go."

Henricks' Wildcats, the Manhattan entrant into the National Baseball Congress tournament, have played together for two years and won last year's NBC under-13 championship in Russell, Kan., after going 60-18 during the regular season.

Henricks said an ongoing goal for the MBA is to establish Manhattan as an annual site for the NBC event.

"What we would like to do here in Manhattan is make this a destination location for a world series every year," Henricks said. "They typically change the sites by ages, but I think there's some real logic in saying that a location will have a certain age group."

Manhattan already is host to two tournaments in June each year that provide an early look at NBC competition. Eighty or 90 teams from around the Midwest have traveled to the Little Apple for an annual early tuneup competition before the national tournament in August.

ROBBIE WILLIAMS

Sing When You're Winning, Capitol Records by Steve Lichtenstein

Brash, Arrogant, Self-Indulgent. Possibly the best words to sum up Robbie Williams, whose second US album (following 1999's appropriately titled The Ego Has Landed) finds the former Take That star (the UK's New Kids, er, Backstreet, or N'Sync of the early '90's) at his pop masterful best. Whether it be subtle, earnest ballads like "Better Man" and "Love Calling Earth," or groove thumpers like the infectious "Rock DJ" (with its stunning/nauseating video) or "Knutsford City Limits," Williams is definitely winning. Hence all the kudos. Might as well add superb to the list and bulk up the ego a little more. GPA: 3.6 - Help Robbie's insecurity and listen to: "Let Love Be Your Energy," "The Road to Mandalay," "Rock DJ"

CREEPER LAGOON

Watering Ghost Garden, spinART Records by Steve Lichtenstein

A little bit of everything blots indie fav Creeper Lagoon's new EP, Watering Ghost Garden, a six song hodge-podge of layered, atmospheric rock. The abstract, dissociated bravado ("Time sits on a corner/curling up inside a glass") of the flaming lips-tinged "Roman Hearts" gives way to the modern rock radio feel of "Big Money Struggle." All things considered, the brief album is more than enough to give fans salivating for the San Franciscoan's next full-length effort something of substance to chew on until then. GPA: 3.1 - Go swimming in: "My Friends Adore You," "Big Money Struggle"

Digging around a gas pipeline is dangerous.

If you plan to dig

A ruptured gas line can cause life-threatening fires or explosion as well as excess erosion and leaks. If you plan to do any ground work that includes ditch digging, posthole digging, sewer cleanout, construction, deep plowing, or laying underground cable, water or irrigation lines, call this number first:

1-800-DIG SAFE
(1-800-344-7233)

Trained personnel will mark the location of our lines so you can work safely.

If you suspect that you've damaged a gas line while digging or if you notice any signs of a gas leak, first shut off and abandon any equipment.

(Do not operate any equipment or mechanical device that will generate a spark.)

Then leave the area immediately.

Use your common senses to detect natural gas leaks

Smell. Natural gas alone does not have a distinctive odor. Sometimes natural gas contains additives to give it an odor resembling rotten eggs or sulfur.

Sight. Visible clues include water or dirt blowing in the air, persistent bubbling in standing water, discoloration of vegetation or obvious actual natural gas coming up from the ground.

Sound. Be aware of hissing, blowing or roaring sounds that may indicate a natural gas leak.

If you encounter any of these situations call 911 and call us at 1-800-794-4780.

GRADUATION GUIDE

Kansas State Collegian ■ Fall 2000

Manhattan merchants carry plethora of gifts

By SHANNON MARSHALL
Kansas State Collegian

Once the final strains of "Pomp and Circumstance" have faded away, all that will remain to serve as reminder of the glories of graduation day will be a few scraps of brightly colored confetti.

But don't forget about the presents.

Several Manhattan businesses are prepared for this weekend's graduation, armed with plenty of ideas for last-minute gift-buyers.

Varney's Book Store has a number of items for graduates heading into the work force, including leather planners and pen and letter opener sets. Leah Sobba, apparel and gift manager, said Varney's has a number of traditional gifts.

"K-State T-shirts and sweat-shirts are always popular, as well as coffee mugs with T-shirts inside," she said. "This year we're also offering new diploma frames."

Shirley Taylor of The Palace gift shop in Aggieville said her store has a number of gift ideas, including picture frames, inspirational books, graduation-themed figurines, K-State flags, and Powercat paperweights and diploma holders.

The K-State Union Bookstore is offering a wide selection of gift ideas as well. Tena Stoller, clothing and gift buyer for the bookstore said traditionally popular gifts have been sweat-shirts, T-shirts, license plate frames and pens and pencils with the K-State logo.

She said gifts that will prepare students for the workforce environment are popular, as well.

"Gifts that are good for parents to buy are drafting tables, easels for art students and painting sets," she said.

An unusual item for sale this year is a wooden K-State Powercat clock. "It's available in walnut, oak and purple heartwood," she said. "You can pick what kind of wood you want."

For those students buying gifts for more than one person, Stoller recommended alumni T-shirts and sweatshirts. She said the bookstore also has flower and balloon arrangements available, ranging from a single carnation or mylar balloon to a bouquet of flowers or balloons.

For the technologically savvy, Staples office supply store offers a variety of options. General Manager Lee Overly said hand-held organizers have been very popular this year, as well as scanners. Higher-priced items that sell well for students are laptop computers and desktop computer towers.

"These gifts are good for parents to buy," Overly said. "Computer office programs such as Microsoft Office are usually good gifts from parents, too, because they like to get them set up with programs such as Word and Excel."

Overly said his store's hottest items right now are purple office chairs manufactured by Global.

"You can order them in any style or color you choose, but any style in purple has been really popular," he said. "I just got 12 in this week, and I don't expect them to last for long."

Overcrowding means tickets needed for graduate ceremony

By NANCY HULL
Kansas State Collegian

Increasing student numbers have led to some changes in this fall's commencement ceremonies.

Last spring, there was an overflow of about 100 people at the Graduate School's ceremony in McCain Auditorium, so tickets will be required for admittance to the K-State fall ceremony, Maridell Berroth, Graduate School office specialist, said.

Each student participating in the ceremony will be issued four tickets. If more tickets are needed, students can be put on a list to receive four additional tickets.

An estimated 240 students are eligible to walk in the graduate school's ceremony this fall. Berroth said this number is about half the number of students who walked in spring.

"There shouldn't be an overflow problem for fall. We're going to see how the tickets go, and then decide if it will work in the spring," Berroth said.

When final grades come out after commencement, less than 10 percent of the students usually do not meet the requirements to obtain degrees, Berroth said.

The Office of the Registrar said more than 1,300 undergraduate students are potential graduates this fall. Spring numbers usually double the fall numbers. Last fall, 921 undergraduates actually received degrees, but the number of students who participated in the ceremony was higher.

During this fall's ceremonies, each student will receive a diploma cover and a letter from the student's respective college.

Joanne Ringle, office specialist for the College of Arts and Sciences, said the 320 students who have been approved for commencement ceremonies is an increase of 50 to 70 students from last fall. She said around 25 students fail to meet graduation requirements each semester.

Since numbers for commencement go up every year, she said the College of Arts and Sciences commencement started half an hour earlier than usual last spring.

"With all the ceremonies in Bramlage, we were starting to cut it close," Ringle said. "For December graduation, everything will stay the same this time."

Elissa Balch, senior in rhetoric communications, will participate in graduation Saturday, and said about 15 or 20 of her family members and friends are expected to attend.

"Just from past experience with graduations, I'm sure they'll want to get there early to make sure we can get 15 seats all together," Balch said.

She said she attended last spring's Arts and Sciences ceremony, which ran past the time limit.

"I hope there won't be any people waiting this time for the next ceremony," she said. "Since this graduation is smaller, I wouldn't think there would be any problems."

Editor ready to pack up possessions, MEMORIES

BECKY WILSON/Collegian

When I was younger, I dreamed about this moment — the time when I broke free and moved away from it all. Of course, at the time I thought I would be headed to supporting myself as a country western performer, living in Nashville.

Things have changed, including my voice. Today, I couldn't sing three bars from an LFO song, which explains why my childhood dream of country western stardom has no direct connection to my career in journalism.

Since high school I've known I wanted to be a journalist, and after my first few years of college I thought I was ready to head out into this so-called real world. I just knew I was ready to leave college and the lifestyle that comes with being a student. I thought I was ready both physically and mentally, but a year and a half later, I'm not as sure.

In a few weeks I'll be packing up for Iowa City, Iowa, taking with me a lot more than I brought to K-State as a transfer student 2 1/2 years ago. What I'm taking won't necessarily fill a bunch of boxes, but it will fill my memory: the conversations and times I spent with friends I made at K-State.

These friends are the people who are always there for me, and the ones I know will always relate to what's happening with my day — they too have been so broke they couldn't afford to pay attention. They too have procrastinated to the point they have to pull all-nighters to finish a 10-page paper due the next day.

Yes, they too get excited about things many people my age don't even care about — conversations about the long dash, or the nation's transition to online journalism. For many of them, the Collegian also has been one of the most important parts of their life.

These friends have helped me become who I am. These good times and the faces behind them will be what I pack as I move on with my life. Sure, by attending classes I did have the chance to partake in activities such as test the quality of chocolate chip cookies, take a statistics-based Pepsi Cola challenge and even spend class time analyzing the words of Men at Work's "Down Under." That was all part of my college experience, too, but it was not as important to me.

It's usually not the lecture that I remember from class, but what one of my professors might have mentioned about the Collegian, or just seeing other students strategically fold the paper so they can read Campus Fourum or do the crossword puzzle during that period. This is how I relate, how I fit into the puzzle of K-State students.

I spend most of my day at the Collegian. Part of it is my responsibilities to the paper, but it's also because my friends are there. My mom always teased me about being the one afraid I was going to miss out on something, and maybe I'm afraid if I leave for too long I'll miss out on something. It's the journalist in me, I guess.

A year and a half after I was so sure I was ready to take on the world, I'm having doubts. Sure, I think I'm capable, but readiness is different.

When I think about it now, maybe K-State is my Nashville. The Collegian is my recording studio, and my friends are members of the band. I know it's silly, but I guess tomorrow I'm graduating to my new label. I know it's the sensible career move, but that means starting over again.

Reed is a senior in print journalism (for now, anyway). You can e-mail him at rad0410@ksu.edu.

Senior says goodbye, apologizes for damage

What — no fireworks?

My 4 1/2 year struggle with classwork, homework and working to pay the rent is finally over. I suppose I expected the sky to open and the "Hallelujah Chorus" to resound throughout campus, but it looks like I'm graduating and all I get is this lousy tassel.

As I stare down what often is called "the first day of the rest of your life," I wish I could grab every freshman I see (yes, you can tell they're freshman — they still wear make-up and khakis to class) and share all that I've learned during my time on campus. Instead, I'm left to believe that I owe most of K-State — and possibly the entire city of Manhattan — a long and detailed apology. I've left quite a path of destruction during my trek through higher education, and I regret (most of) what I've laid to waste around my dear alma mater.

First and foremost, I feel I have to apologize to my instructors. They've put up with my daydreaming, lame excuses and class skippage for far too long, and their efforts to expand my horizons often have ended in poor grades and bitter teacher evaluations. My professors, lab assistants and graduate teaching assistants should know that I have, in fact, managed to retain a great deal of information over the past 8 1/2 semesters.

Unfortunately, I've fried a good percentage of brain cells in my efforts to secure a job after graduation, so I couldn't conjugate any verb in the Spanish language if I tried (Lo siento, Sra. O'Malley).

I would like to apologize to the hard-working officers of the Riley County Police Department, who find absolutely no humor in vandalism, underage drinking or public nudity. I no longer steal traffic signs, I turned 22 this year and ... well, maybe there are a few lessons I still have to learn.

Dear Ally, Amy, Erica, Beth, Katie, Little and the long-suffering Somer — I'm the worst roommate in the world. Thank you for excusing my dirty dishes, piles of laundry and my tendency to borrow anything and everything in your closet. Pray that life in The Real World will teach me something about housework.

I've had my heart stolen and broken over the years, but I know of others who carry the scars of previous relationships. I'm sorry I've hurt so many in my quest to find out more about myself, and I'm sorry for the treatment many undeserving people suffered because of me. Of course, it has helped me learn life's most important dating lessons: don't date anyone you meet at the bars, your workplace or your apartment complex (these relationships will end quickly, and they will end badly).

I'm sorry that the receptionists at K-State Parking Services, the Riley County Courthouse and Sunflower Bank have become helpless victims of my wrath. My wheel locks, speeding tickets and bounced checks are not your fault. (However, I have no regrets concerning the Varney's Book Store employee who handed me $2 for a textbook I paid $65 for — it's extortion, and you people should be ashamed of yourselves.)

I'm sorry I made fun of the College Republicans and their dedication to their party (but have you guys ever REALLY listened to George W. Bush speak?).

I'm sorry for snoring in the middle of Landon Lectures.

I'm sorry I couldn't make a single deadline during my extended employment at the Collegian.

But most of all, I'm sorry for missed opportunities.

I'm sorry I was never able to scramble to the top of a goalpost at KSU Stadium and moon a Nebraska fan.

I'm sorry I have never had the time to take part in the efforts of student organizations as they try to better themselves, the campus or the world.

I'm especially sorry that I'm left with apologies as I watch the greatest years of my life wind to an end.

Maybe I do have advice for Manhattan's newest Wildcats, those who have a long and potentially great college career ahead of them. Make the most of your time here, wee ones. I hope your years here offer you the same it offered me — I leave here with memories I will laugh (and probably cry) about for the rest of my life.

Don't leave here with "I'm sorry ..." on your mind. The only regret a K-State graduate should have is that they weren't able to drag out their college education in order to stick around Manhattan as long as possible.

Jenn is ready to be unleashed upon the world. If you want to catch her before she blows town for good, e-mail her at jenndavo@hotmail.com.

Association keeps students in touch

By JESSICA PITTS

Kansas State Collegian

December graduates will have an opportunity to stay involved in K-State activities through the KSU Alumni Association.

"By becoming a member of the Alumni Association, graduates are able to keep in touch with K-State," said Karen Schroeder, director of communications for the Alumni Association. "They also receive many benefits like the K-Stater magazine, alumni events and mailings from the association telling about the events."

K-Stater magazine deals with academics, athletics and also has a section called "Class Notes" that provides updates about members.

"The Class Notes section is one of the most popular sections for the alumni," Schroeder said. "Through several surveys, we have found that that is the first section they open up to. They are interested in what people are doing."

Alumni events also are popular with members, Schroeder said, because they are a way to meet other alumni in the area. There are 26 clubs in Kansas and 62 out-of-state clubs.

"Depending on the area, the groups will meet for certain activities," Schroeder said. "Some examples are picnics in the summer, K-State Day at a Chiefs football game, guest speakers from the university and Watch Parties."

Schroeder said the Watch Parties are gaining popularity with alumni.

"They usually start when a few alumni get together to watch a K-State football or basketball game, and then it grows from there," she said. "More and more groups are starting this tradition, though, especially those who are out of state and can't make it back for the games."

Other benefits members receive are a 15-percent discount at the K-State Student Union Bookstore, 15-percent discount on green fees and apparel at Colbert Hills Golf Course, a complementary wall calendar mailed in the K-Stater magazine, discount rates for Powercat Illustrated and use of the Chester E. Peters Recreational Complex and Hale Library.

Several colleges and departments within K-State give new graduates a free membership in the Alumni Association for one year.

The colleges are: Agriculture, Business Administration, Education, Engineering, Human Ecology, Veterinary Medicine and Technology and Aviation.

Also, the Department of Interior Architecture and the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications offer memberships.

"This helps the student who just received his undergraduate degree in those colleges or departments stay connected," Schroeder said. "It is a nice gift."

Michael Holen, dean of the College of Education, said he agrees that it helps keep graduates connected.

"I think anything an institution can do to stay connected to their graduates is a good thing," Holen said. "They get several benefits by becoming a member, and I think most find the K-Stater magazine to be a high quality benefit. It is an attractive way to stay in touch."

Jamie Johnston, a fall 1999 graduate, said she was happy to get the free membership into the Alumni Association from the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications when she graduated.

"It really helped me stay connected to the university and the journalism school," Johnston said. "I plan to return to K-State for graduate school so this helped me stay affiliated with the school."

Schroeder said the Alumni Association also works with groups and colleges to help organize reunions.

"When we were a smaller university, we would have class reunions because there was more unity in class," Schroeder said. "But now that the school is bigger, we have found that alumni relate better to departments or clubs that they were involved in."

However, they do have an Alumni Class Reunion in April for students who graduated 50 or more years ago.

"They are inducted into the Golden K Club and invited back every year after that," she said.

For students wishing to join the Alumni Association, the annual fees are $15 for people who graduated one to five years ago and $30 for graduates over six years.

"We also have joint memberships for spouses and life memberships available," Schroeder said. "The benefits really outweigh the cost."

Commission discusses proposed bus routes

■ Transit system focused on high-need areas of Manhattan.

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
Kansas State Collegian

After years of debate, studies and speculation, a rough draft has been unveiled for public transportation in Manhattan. Now the question is whether it would be supported by potential riders.

At Tuesday's Manhattan City Commission work session, a conceptual service plan was presented for a citywide transit system funded by the city government and K-State. Completed by the 16-member steering committee for the project, the plan proposes two primary routes: a "Bramlage Park and Ride" shuttle system and an "Aggieville Special" transportation service, moving in and out of the area on evenings.

Combined, the services are estimated to cost $1.49 million for the first year, including start-up costs. Buses are proposed to run every 30 minutes for weekdays between 6 a.m. and 6 p.m. on the two primary routes and 60 minutes for all other routes, days and times. The exception is the Bramlage Coliseum shuttle, proposed to stop every 10 minutes.

The conceptual plan is the result of years of discussions about K-State's parking difficulties combined with separate city- and university-wide transportation studies conducted by Kansas City, Mo.-based consultant TranSystems Corporation in both cases.

Student Body President Jake Worcester, also a member of the steering committee, inherited many of the transit issues from his predecessor, Jason Heinrich. In fact, he said, the Bramlage plan originally was developed for K-State alone to ease growing parking troubles. Worcester said he strongly supports teaming with the city for advantages the state and federal aid.

"My goal all along was, if we can work with the city and develop it together, it's a better plan for everyone," he said.

By the same token, TranSystems Associate Ted Rieck said K-State is an important enough part of the community

Proposed Bus Routes

The Transportation Steering Committee proposed the following bus routes to the City Commission at Tuesday's work session.

Routes 1 and 2 would require student fees of about $10 per semester, combined with city funding and federal transportation money that would be allocated if the Manhattan census count reaches 50,000. Students could show their I.D.s and ride for free, while non-students would pay about $.50 per ride.

Route 3 is the Bramlage Park and Ride route, which would most likely require a student parking permit with bus fees from Parking Services.

The committee also proposed the Aggieville Special route, which would circle the city and run from 10 p.m. to 2 a.m. Friday and Saturday nights during the school year.

Winter break workers

■ K-State facilities does not shut down for the holidays; students stick around for the paycheck, spring preparation.

By JAMIE BARRETT
Kansas State Collegian

Winter break primarily brings to mind presents, Christmas trees, time with family and the ball in New York's Times Square dropping to bring in the New Year. Most students surround themselves with these things during their time off from school, but several K-State students remained on campus to help K-State facilities prepare for students to return.

Zuzana Strouhalova is one of those students. Strouhalova, senior in nuclear chemical engineering, worked for K-State Custodial Services over winter break. Strouhalova said she had a good time working at her job and was glad that she stayed on campus during her time off.

"I stayed to work because I was able to go to New Orleans over the New Year," said Strouhalova, an exchange student from Prague, Czech Republic. "I wanted to go there with my host family, so I decided to stay here rather than go home for the break."

Strouhalova began working for Custodial Services when she first came to K-State in August. She said the work they did over winter break was not too different from what they normally do, but it was easier to get done with all the students and professors not on campus.

"We cleaned the buildings and just did general work that needed to be done to specific areas," she said. "It was a good opportunity for me to earn some money over break, and that was just what I did."

Chris Campos, minor repairs supervisor for the Division of Facilities, said during the winter break facilities division is able to get a lot of cleaning and maintenance done.

"We work on the upkeep of the buildings and do whatever remodeling needs to be done," Campos said. "We work all year long, so it is not like any certain time period is especially different for us."

Ben Harder, junior in international business and marketing, works for K-State's Department of Housing and Dining Services as a locksmith. Harder said he worked throughout his winter break, doing various tasks to update the residence halls and dining centers.

"Most of our time was taken up by changing the locks on rooms in the dorms that students had left," Harder said. "There are a lot of students that move out and do not turn in their keys. We probably did 60-

Some of the money that would have supported the student activities center might be used to make Forum Hall in the K-State Student Union more accessible for the disabled.

"We are currently going through the process to try to be able to use that money for this purpose," Ryan Walker, privilege fee chair, said. "The problem is, we have to go through the judicial board first to make sure the money is acceptable to use on Forum Hall."

The committee is asking the judicial board to interpret a part of the Student Senate constitution that, in essence, says buildings funded by the privilege fee cannot be renovated or added on to by again using privilege fee funds.

"If the judicial board says, 'Yes, the money can be spent on this,' then it will go through the Privilege Fee Committee and the Student Senate to be voted on," Walker said. "We are also asking the judicial board to decide if this should become a referendum, and in that case, the student body would also have to vote."

The amount of money required to make Forum Hall accessible has not been determined.

Now, the only way disabled students can enter Forum Hall is through an exterior fire door, but they first must find a building manager to unlock the Student dies in car accident

Lucinda Juanita Goossen, sophomore in animal science and industry, died in a two-vehicle accident near Goessel, Kan., on Kansas Highway 15, Jan. 5.

Goossen was from Goessel and was born in Newton, Kan., on June 30, 1981. She is the daughter of Ervin Goossen and Maria Belia Trevino.

Memorial services were Wednesday at the Alexanderwohl Mennonite Church near Goessel.

Goossen had been an active member in the Alpha of Clovia scholarship house since she was a freshman. Natalie Nelson, Clovia member, said Goossen was involved in many house functions.

"She was fun, outgoing and loved to meet people," she said.

Lynn Jackson, Clovia house mother, said Goossen was focused on academics and was involved at K-State.

"She was full of enthusiasm, optimistic and excited about her future," Jackson said.

Goossen was a multicultural ambassador and a member of the Alexanderwohl Mennonite Church, the American Dairy Association, the Student Organization of Rotary International, Pre-Vet Club and Dairy Science Club.

Tim Rozell, Goossen's academic adviser and Dairy Science Club adviser, said she will be remembered most for her sense of humor and leadership skills.

Goossen is survived by her sister, Carmelita Goossen, freshman in agriculture education. She also is survived by her parents: her brother, Alexander; and her grandmother, Agnes Goossen.

The Manhattan Mennonite Church and Clovia house have planned a memorial service for 6:30 p.m. Jan. 17 in All Faiths Chapel.

TWA files for bankruptcy, merges with American Airlines

By DAVID KOENIG
The Associated Press

DALLAS — American Airlines agreed Wednesday to acquire most of Trans World Airlines' assets for about $500 million in a complex deal that will bring an end to the financially troubled TWA, 75 years after it became a pioneer in passenger aviation.

The agreement, along with a separate pact under which American would buy some of US Airways' assets from United Airlines, would place American and United in control of about half of the nation's air-travel market.

As part of the deal, TWA filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection and will sell most of its assets to American, a subsidiary of AMR Corp., for $500 million in cash.

American also will assume responsibility for TWA's aircraft leases and provide an additional $200 million in immediate financing for the St. Louis-based airline.

In a concurrent move, American is acquiring some US Airways assets for $1.2 billion in cash and the assumption of $300 million in aircraft leases. It will also pay $82 million for 49 percent of startup DC Air, which will fly out of Reagan National Airport in Washington.

The latter portions of the deal are contingent on federal regulators approving United parent UAL Corp.'s $4.3 billion proposal to purchase US Airways. Antitrust regulators have pressed United, the world's largest carrier, to sell off some of its operations before they approve its purchase of US Airways, the nation's No. 6 carrier.

If everything is approved, Chicago-based United and American, the nation's No. 2 carrier, would stand head and shoulders above the rest of the U.S.

Cats take opportunity to visit Dallas hospital

Dallas was more than a Southwestern Bell Cotton Bowl trip for the K-State football squad.

Head coach Bill Snyder's players visited the Texas Scottish Rite Hospital on Dec. 27 to autograph posters, T-shirts, hats and toys provided by the Dr Pepper Bottling Company, FOX 4 and Bank of America.

Jake Todd, a 9-year-old patient at the hospital, also made a special presentation to Snyder of artwork he drew depicting the Wildcat logo.

"I've had the good fortune being involved with the East-West Shrine game and a number of other quality events that allow young people of college age to spend time with those so far less fortunate than themselves," Snyder said. "It's an enjoyable thing to see our young people interact with young children who are ill or handicapped in some way. It really leaves an impact on the lives of our young people."

Freshman linebacker and Fort Worth, Texas, native Terry Pierce said he felt that impact.

"I think it's nice to be able to come here and make a day for the kids," he said. "It's really nice to see how the kids light up just to see us, to see there are people who actually care about them besides their families."

TSRHC President J.C. Montgomery welcomed the Wildcats to the facility, which serves as one of the nation's leading pediatric centers for the treatment of orthopedic conditions, neurological disorders and learning disabilities.

In addition to the main activities, though, a select group of K-State players also visited in-room patients at the hospital who were unable to attend the ceremonies in the main atrium.

"These kids are incredible," senior fullback Johnno Lazetich said. "These kids have to overcome such adversity in their lives. You would like to hope that some of the things they are going through are the worse that's going to happen to them and that they will blossom into beautiful people."

Spring 2001 auditions for K-State Theatre today

Auditions for all K-State Theatre spring shows will be at 7 tonight in Nichols Hall Library.

The Department of Speech Communication, Theatre and Dance will present four shows this semester and is hoping to fill all roles with the auditions today.

"In the spring, we only have one day of auditions and one day of call-backs," Christopher Piatt, theater marketing associate, said. "It is really important that we get people to the auditions today."

Piatt said the auditions are open to any K-State student regardless of their major or experience.

"We really want a wide variety of people to show up, so we welcome anyone," he said. "No experience or preparation is necessary. We just want you to show up, and we will take it from there. We will discuss the nature of the plays and then continue with the auditions."

The shows for this semester are "Arcadia" by Tom Stoppard; "Fuddy Meers," a student-directed comedy; "A Soldier's Play," an Ebony Theater production of a Pulitzer Prize winning play; and "Tongue of a Bird," a workshop reading.

"We have a large variety of shows and we think that we have a role for almost anyone," Piatt said.

Simulator developed to gauge driver distractions

DETROIT — Ford Motor Co. has built a driving simulator to study how drivers can get distracted by cell phones and other gadgets.

The problem is a significant concern for an industry hot on selling in-car Internet access and other similar services.

Ford said Wednesday that it will spend $10 million on the simulator, called VIRTUEX, and research. It will be used to measure how drivers interact with cell phones, in-car Internet services and other electronic gadgets while driving.

"What we need to understand is what level of distraction is acceptable," said Helen Petrauskas, Ford vice president for safety. "We're used to listening to the radio or talking to a passenger, but how does new technology compare?"

Years of research have shown that distractions of all kinds are a main cause of accidents. According to federal statistics, driver distraction was a factor in 10 percent of fatal accidents in 1999.

NYC settles in lawsuit over jail strip searches

NEW YORK — The city has agreed to pay as much as $50 million to settle a lawsuit on behalf of thousands of people who were illegally strip-searched, attorneys for the plaintiffs said Wednesday.

The searches were conducted by jail guards over 10 months in 1996 and 1997. They often were performed on first-time offenders

Roundabout, stoplight discussed as solutions to intersection accidents

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
Kansas State Collegian

The audience at Tuesday's Manhattan City Commission work session made one thing quite clear — roundabouts are not loved by everyone in Manhattan.

The meeting itself was a discussion of options to improve the intersection of North Manhattan and Kimball avenues. The city recently been has confirmed for a state grant that will cover a portion of the improvement project.

Given the intersection's history for collisions — 78 recorded by the city between 1991 and July 2000 — representatives of the city-chosen HWS Consulting Group outlined three options.

HWS, based in Omaha, Neb., recommended signal lights or a roundabout to better regulate traffic in the area. A grade separation was also presented, but consultants discarded the option because of its much higher cost and limited potential success.

Left with a decision of signal lights or a roundabout, the roundabout had limited popularity.

Jim Konkright said he has driven along Kimball for years, and said he wants breaks in the traffic instead of a concrete island drivers will run around.

"I don't think it's better than a four-way stop," he said.

On the same vein, Konkright said HWS needs to update its traffic data since the intersection of Dennison and Kimball avenues replaced its four-way stop signs with a lighted signal.

"If you're going to give us the safety factors, give it up to date," he said.

Pat Frey, whose back yard sits near Kimball Avenue, wanted to know how emergency vehicles would fare with the roundabouts.

"My concern is the fire trucks going on this road," she said, "and do they have to go 20 miles per hour?"

Jack Messer, local office manager for HWS, said the roundabouts could accommodate the trucks. In addition, he said certain accidents would no longer occur.

"In the case of a roundabout, we will eliminate right-angle accidents. It can't occur," he said.

Traffic lights were rarely brought up by the audience, and sometimes only to lead into roundabouts.

Mike Nelson asked if a traffic light at the intersection could be traffic controlled or timed to work with flow on Tuttle Creek Boulevard.

HWS Vice President Mike Gorman said it could.

"Can you do it with a roundabout?" Nelson asked.

The Tuesday meeting was one of several chances for citizens to voice opinions on the intersection.

Another workshop open to the public is scheduled for 5 p.m. Jan. 23, again in the city commission room of City Hall. The Manhattan City Commission is scheduled to decide the issue at its Feb. 6 meeting.

U.S. Postal Service, FedEx to team up in collection

The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The U.S. Postal Service and rival FedEx announced an agreement Wednesday to work together, with FedEx carrying mail on its fleet of aircraft and the post office placing FedEx collection boxes in its facilities.

"The Postal Service delivers Main Street and FedEx provides an air fleet," Postmaster General William Henderson said.

"Whenever the public and private sectors work together, the real beneficiary is the American public," Frederick W. Smith, chairman of FedEx said.

The post office expects to pay FedEx $6.3 billion over seven years to carry its Express Mail and Priority Mail as well as some first-class mail, postal officials said. The agreement takes effect in August.

The Memphis, Tenn.-based delivery company has more than 600 aircraft in service, which operate a nationwide overnight delivery system. The post office has its own smaller fleet of planes.

Contracting with FedEx should save the post office considerably more than the cost, officials said, by allowing the agency to reduce or eliminate its own air fleet and perhaps reduce the amount of mail shipped on commercial airlines.

At the same time, FedEx is expected to pay between $126 million and $232 million to locate its collection boxes at post offices, depending on the number of boxes installed.

BUS ROUTES

that its support might be required for a transit system to work.

"It's pretty clear people would like to see the city and university working together," he said.

Surveys distributed to students also indicate the interest exists at K-State, Rieck said.

"The number one reason students would support a transit system is the parking on campus," he said. "It's a symbiotic relationship."

Interest alone, however, will not pay a nearly $1.5 million bill. Under the plan created by the steering committee, the city would supply $260,000 directly. K-State would pay $350,000, funded under the plan by a mandatory $10 charge to full-time students each semester. Passenger fees for non-K-State students, proposed at $50 for adults and $25 for the disabled and elderly, are estimated to contribute $40,000.

The Bramlage shuttle, at a cost of $340,000, would be funded entirely by K-State Parking Services.

Survey information, using 374 K-State students and 398 non-student residents, indicated 75.6 percent of respondents would pay 50 cents or more per trip. Of students, 43 percent were very willing, and 36 percent were somewhat willing to pay an extra $2 a month in taxes for public transit. Of residents, 42 percent were very willing and 26 percent were somewhat willing to pay the same amount.

In the student surveys, 64 percent were very supportive of a $10 per semester fee for public transportation and 19 percent were somewhat supportive to the same proposal.

Assuming the preliminary numbers are accurate and that all these sources of funding were secured, Manhattan is still taking a $500,000 gamble on the proposed budget. Under the proposed budget, $500,000 also would be supplied by a combination of federal and state funds.

Karen Davis, director of community development for the city, said those funds depend entirely on whether the city population reaches 50,000 persons, according to the 2000 U.S. Census. For this grant, the funds will depend all-or-nothing on whether Manhattan totals up to 50,000 residents for an urbanized area designation. Davis said the city should have a good idea of what the results will be by March. A housing study last year estimated the city population at 51,000, she said, though the numbers do not meet census requirements.

If those funds do not come in, Worcester said he seriously would consider supporting both the Bramlage shuttle with the rest of the plan.

"If we don't reach that 50,000 number, I don't know how we'll go on," he said.

He did say the transit needs to include the Aggieville Special, supplying a safe ride transit system students have wanted for some time.

"We definitely want that to be part of it," Worcester said.

Without the $500,000, Rieck said the options would be to change the plan, supplying the funds from somewhere else or reducing planned services.

"At that point, all bets are off," he said.

For now, Rieck said TranSystems still plans to complete the proposal to the city this spring, refining estimates into a street-ready plan that at least provides the electorate with more detailed information.

Worcester and TranSystems also will present the proposal to Student Senate on Jan. 18 as well as another workshop at the K-State Student Union from 1 p.m. to 3 p.m. Jan. 23 and at a city location to be announced from 5:30 p.m. to 7:30 p.m. on the same day.

Editorials make room for new forum section

In the past, there has been an editorial board accompanying every Opinion page.

This semester we are trying to do things differently. We will only present an editorial every Monday, Wednesday and Friday. On those days, we also will have the original Campus Forum.

On Tuesday and Thursday we are planning to extend Campus Forum, along with a new idea. That idea will consist of a section titled "On the topic" and "Off the topic." At the bottom of the forum will be listed the next topic for readers to voice their opinion on. Calls related to that will be printed under the "On the topic" section. The other calls will be placed under "Off the topic."

Tuesday's "On the topic" is the following question: What do you think of reality-based TV shows?

The Collegian's Campus Forum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on topics relevant to the publication.

Those calling the Forum will have 30 seconds to speak about issues on campus or in the news. The number is 395-4444.

Listed below are some tips to use when calling the Forum.

- Keep your opinion based on issues, not personal vendettas.
- It might be helpful to write down your comments before calling. There is only time for about two to three short sentences.
- Give an original opinion. The Collegian will try to offer as many diverse opinions as possible. Be sure to put an original spin on your comments.
- Don't give too much background on the issue. Immediately state your stance or a plan of action.
- Be honest. We don't ask for your name, nor do we use Caller ID to see where the comments are coming from. Your opinion is completely anonymous.
- The Collegian reserves the right to choose what is printed. We will not print any comments that are vulgar or obscene.

Student journalists need to learn from mistakes

Editor,

I dropped by the Collegian Web site today, just to see how things were going at my old haunts.

Lo and behold, the student newspaper was at it again. It seems a misguided student columnist mistakenly attributed distribution of a controversial newsletter to some Aggieville businesses.

So, in the two short years I've been away, the Collegian staff has found students too boring to meddle with.

Now, instead of destroying the reputations of good-willing student leaders, a guest columnist has taken on the charitable business leaders of the Manhattan community.

Shame on you. In the interests of publicity, you have jeopardized the integrity of student journalism and the reputation of an award-winning newspaper. Luckily, there is light at the end of the tunnel.

Fortunately, after my turbulent last semester at K-State, after serving as the Student Governing Association's elections coordinator, I was able to go on with my life. I now enjoy a successful career in broadcast journalism. And these businesses also will go on. They will continue to do well in the community and serve the needs of Manhattan residents.

Good for them. They will overcome. I hope student journalists will learn from their mistakes.

Exploring the UNKNOWN

Finding important questions, not answers, key to finding universal truths

KEN WELLS

People are stupid.

OK, there are a few who break the mold, who exercise one or two of the ol' brain cells on at least a daily basis (uh, but not me — I don't get paid enough to think). But as a species, face it, we're dumber than a box of hair.

Contest it, if you will. Insist we're superior to the dolphin. Remind me that it is we and not those finny guppy-breathed freaks who have invented the Internet, Cool Whip and Legos. But we've also committed environmental rape, we drive while obliviously yapping on cell phones and we're at least indirectly responsible for "Temptation Island" hitting the airwaves. If there were any justice, we'd see Rupert Murdoch in shackles in Nuremberg by the end of the year.

And let's face it — I think we all know the dolphins are a lot happier. But I digress. Individually, the visionaries of our species have tremendous potential to let our imaginations pierce the veil of impossibility and breathe a genuine spark of creation in the universe. The rest apparently are fated for one of four destinies: establishing dot-com companies (remember those?), driving through Topeka (holy cow, it's like Pampolona with crosswalks), being the general manager of the Kansas City Royals or just waking — or keeping — me up.

This doesn't bother me. Used to. And so did the fact that the visionary-to-waste-of-flesh ratio was about one per million, last I checked. But I've stopped railing against the hopelessness of the herd. It doesn't bother me anymore.

No, what is bothering me is the concept that we — collectively — must be able to understand the universe. It's got to be able to make sense. We think we know the shape and flavor of Creation. We think we know why we are drawn to who we are. We expect to be able to comprehend the sum total of everything which has ever been and all that ever will be. If it exists and we're not able to break it down into a flowchart or an infographic, something in our skull starts buzzing.

We're not only stupid. We're damned arrogant.

I'm not saying religion is futile — just that there's a sincere difference between believing in and knowing God and achieving omniscience. And I'm not even saying that no human ever will be able to comprehend life's little mysteries — you know, like why a whole row of metered stalls gets roped off as "reserved" and who really gets to park there.

I am saying that if someone does crack one of the ancient mysteries of philosophy or science or mathematics, we can't expect everyone to be capable of understanding it. If we need refresher courses on the Bowl Championship Series or the Electoral College every time they're mentioned ... for that matter, by virtue of implementing either of those systems, I think we're a hazelnut surprise short of a full box of chocolates.

There probably are people out there who have fully embraced chaos theory into their awareness to the point where they could tell you who will win the next 12 Super Bowls (Uhm ... I can tell you who won't. But it's not quite the same thing). But these people either are hopeless altruists determined not to use their insights for selfish gains or simply have been driven insane by the burden of near-prophecy. These perceptions can be quite a weight on even the strongest psyche. If that seer happens to be a Celtics fan, snap goes the brain stem.

But it's unsettling, isn't it, to imagine that some ideas and concepts are outside our comprehension? We like everything nicely delineated. If we sit through a 2 1/2 hour movie, we expect to know who killed Mr. Boddy, in what room, with which implements, and worse — why. As children, we want to know why the sky is blue — the fact that it is blue just isn't enough. Eventually, we stop asking why — or our parents just shout the resolute bottom line ("BECAUSE, that's why, you horrid little demon-child!") at ample enough volume to squelch our curiosity and, often, induce psychological scarring.

And in the back of our minds there sits a shelf of empty spaces — reasons never filled in, just ready to house the secret blueprints of the universe. And they itch when they're empty. Why is the sky blue? Why do we have to die? Why did I trust her? What would monkey-and-telephone-flavored ice cream taste like?

We can't know all this. We can't know most of it. And we can't let it unhinge us when we don't.

It's too much to know all the answers. And it wouldn't make us any happier. No, far better, at least, to know all the questions.

We're an overly ambitious type-zero civilization. If we spend less time trying to answer the unknowable (why Ryan Leaf? In the name of God, WHY?), if we stop trying to capture the universe in the palm of our hands, by refining our questions, we can at least guide ourselves on the path we want to take. Just by asking why we're here, asking what we can do, we hone our mind — the first step we need to take. Maybe we can't know what God knows, but at least we should settle for knowing ourselves.

And that done, could someone explain the quarter-back rating to me?

'Temptation Island' not true test of loyalty

Imagine going to a beautiful island and being set up on a variety of dates with three out of 26 sexy singles who are your "type."

Sounds like a dream come true?

More like a nightmare. A nightmare because you are not single; you are in a relatively happy, unmarried relationship that easily can be damaged by this two week vacation.

It is a test of candor, of loyalty, of trust — a test of true love. But it is not a test with a main purpose to find out if someone is faithful; instead it is a chance for nosy viewers to see a firsthand glimpse of possible betrayal.

Trust is one of the most important elements of any relationship. Faith is essential to have in the fact that your significant other will not cheat. A show like this will show if someone will stray. But keep in mind this isn't your typical environment — this is an exotic location filled with sensual individuals.

This is not your usual bar-like atmosphere. This isn't a hole in the wall filled with cigarette smoke and beer guzzling.

Intoxication will not necessarily make way to beer goggles, as it often does in bars.

This is not realistic temptation. It is fabricated.

There is a difference in this situation because in a bar, not everyone will be attracted to you and vice versa. Not everyone in the bar will be on the mission to make you and your significant other split. You will not be similar to a piece of meat dangling from a stick in a form or barbaric entertainment.

If a few members of the couples decide to stray, what will happen when the vacation is over and the camera stops rolling? What will happen when the beautiful island of temptation becomes one of typical movie nights and belching?

And if they cheated on someone to obtain them, they most likely will cheat on that individual as well.

Is it naive to think one can trust their partner without having to go to such drastic, desperate measures? That their words, and their actions, are enough?

These couples are willing to test their relationships. The phrase "willing to test" brings up two thoughts of mind. One is that these couples are so confident with themselves and their partner that they don't see this temptation as a threat. However, the other thought of mind probably is far more likely; it is an opportunity to cheat. It is a chance to test the overall weakness of the relationship. The weakness that is completed with cheating that is caught on tape.

There are several ways to test a commitment, but you don't do that by throwing a new, fresh, seemingly exciting group of single people into the mix.

You test a relationship by loving someone when they are so sick you get to see firsthand what they had to eat that day, without actually asking them. You realize the strength of a relationship when the person you love is doing a nine-year-old dance move at a club and you still choose to be seen with them.

This is a ploy to get ratings, not to get candidness in regards to the strength of ones relationship. I sincerely doubt that the creator's, Rocket Science Laboratories, main purpose is to attempt to show couples who are in love and are choosing not to stray. They want the couples to cheat, and the sad thing is, most of the viewers probably do as well.

Every day, couples are faced with a variety of temptations that could damage not only their relationships, but themselves as well. On a daily basis, their morals, values and trust are challenged. Some of them conquer these various temptations; others fall victim to them.

The challenge lies not with the temptation. The challenge lies in staying true to the element of trust that should be the foundation of any relationship.

Students create COLORFUL concoctions

By NICK BRATKOVIC
Kansas State Collegian

With rubber bands strategically placed, squirt bottles in hand and Union Program Council T-shirts as guinea pigs, K-State students sifted through the Union Courtyard, tie-dyeing shirts and making beaded bracelets.

Jenny Sperflage, freshman in English and psychology, was one student clad in plastic gloves who used an array of paints to design her shirt.

"I think I used every color we had over there," she said.

Sperflage was aided by UPC volunteers. The group of about 100 members had people present, coaching tie dyers through the process and providing plastic bags in which to store shirts.

"Everyone was really great, friendly and ready to help you with your shirt," Sperflage said.

The activities were part of the UPC day of awareness, an annual event at K-State designed to promote the organization.

Michael Rottinghaus, fifth-year senior in secondary education and UPC president, said the day of awareness works out well the day before classes begin because students are in the Union picking up financial-aid checks and buying books.

"Students are more relaxed and don't have to worry about going to classes," he said.

Cristy Welsh, senior in public relations and UPC promotions chairwoman, said she agreed and said the tie-dyeing event, now in its second year, is a good way to promote UPC's other events.

"We thought that tie-dye T-shirts would be something that people would enjoy, and then this year we added power bead bracelets," she said.

Rottinghaus said UPC works to provide quality entertainment throughout the year. The events include movies, debates, comedians and speakers.

"We try to provide entertainment that is cheap and affordable to the K-State student," Rottinghaus said.

Such was the case for Sperflage, who said she was pleased with the design of the shirt and glad to have a relaxing activity to do on her last day of winter break.

"It gives me something to do the day before classes start," she said. "People are moving in, and it kind of makes things crazy."

3rd Street redevelopment plan vetoed by city, county commissions

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
Kansas State Collegian

Too many questions were not being answered.

After spending nearly a year in the public forum and presenting two altered plans, First National Development has been vetoed a second time in a bid to redevelop more than 100 acres of land in east Manhattan.

More than three weeks have passed since the Riley County Commission unanimously vetoed a controversial redevelopment district. Exactly one week ago, the Manhattan City Commission followed suit, terminating its predevelopment agreement with the Chicago-based First National. Members of both commissions said the developer's plans had too many questions that could not be answered.

The redevelopment proposal, brought before the city commission last January, was controversial from the start. The area, east of Fourth Street and between Bluemont Avenue and Leavenworth Street, was proposed as a tax increment financing district.

Under TIF, if the property tax value of the area is increased, that extra money collected will be reinvested by the city for sewer, road or other basic improvements in that area. In addition to debate over whether a TIF district was proper, residents and business owners in the discussed area protested a plan that had no specific steps for their relocation or compensation.

City commissioners allowed the developers to proceed, reserving the option to cancel the agreement at any time. The initial plan continued until the county commission vetoed it the first time in June 2000. Last fall, First National returned with a smaller TIF plan, consisting of one plot for housing and retail that might include a Target store, and another plot for industrial interests. This second draft was vetoed by the county commission a second time Dec. 18.

County Commissioner Bob Newsome said he abstained during the first veto but voted to reject the proposal in December. Newsome said he was unfamiliar with the developer and expected the city to help provide more details on what the developer was going to do in the TIF district.

"I did not feel the city had made any effort to ensure we knew what was planned for the area," he said.

In addition, Newsome said no precautions appeared to be taken to determine if the area had been contaminated by former industrial tenants.

"I saw no evidence it had been checked out," he said.

City Manager Ron Fehr said First National representatives did not want to spend the money, given in the range of $500,000, to detail the plan on nothing more than faith that the city and county would proceed.

"They wanted a show of local commitment before spending the money," Fehr said.

If First National's veto was any indication for the future, he said, it was that developers need strong support from the people where they are moving in. A large part of that, Fehr said, is having a specific plan and involving all the governmental entities early on.

Commissioner Carol Peak said

she agreed. With an area as large as the Third Street TIF, Peak said a developer needs to be willing to do homework on the area and interact extensively with its citizens.

"Without more details, it's very difficult for people to accept a proposal of this size," Peak said.

People living and working in the TIF area probably wanted to know more about businesses moving in, Peak said, and she certainly wanted to know about relocation plans.

At present, Fehr said the city was involved in casual conversation with First National, but did not indicate if the firm was still interested in the area. The area of the Third Street TIF district is still considered prime development property in the Downtown Tomorrow Plan, he said, and could still be developed without TIF.

In the meantime, Fehr said he expects a rezoning application within the month for a Walgreen's project on Fourth Street and Bluemont Avenue, as well as one for a new Wal-Mart north of the existing store in a few more months. Neither one used TIF.

The Third Street area also still could be developed in smaller chunks, he said.

"I think it's possible and quite probable for some piecemeal development," Fehr said.

Peak said she hopes TIF will not be abandoned as an option to maintain a strong downtown.

"I know there are mixed feelings about TIF, but it offers one tool for redevelopment," she said.

For now, Peak said the city commission is in a wait-and-see attitude for potential development.

Professor's treatment discovery leads to new business

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
Kansas State Collegian

When Tammy Stewart gets really sick, she has to sleep in a chair.

She'd rather not, of course, but she prefers to keep breathing through the night.

That would be a bad day. Usually, Manhattan resident Stewart said she always has a runny nose and the need to cough, but only has to take six pills a day. On a bad day, she might have to take oral medication or go to work with IVs.

Stewart has cystic fibrosis, an inherited disorder that usually attacks the respiratory and digestive system by flooding them with unusually thick mucus.

Patients of the disorder not only need to manage a body that clogs itself almost constantly, but one that is all too often a very tempting target for bacteria that set up shop in the lungs.

Diagnosed six weeks into her life, Stewart said she has learned how to manage her diet, steer clear of co-workers with colds and rotate her medications so she will not build an immunity. Hopefully, though, an acquaintance of her's and his infant company might be working on something to help.

John Tomich, professor of biochemistry, did not really expect to research cystic fibrosis. He is trained as a bioorganic chemist, he said. His work happened to lead this way.

Tomich has two patents and has another two pending for technology to create synporins, as he calls them. Synporins are synthetic peptides that can act as channels, or doors, in cells for negatively charged chloride ions.

"It's really a hole in the membrane," Tomich said.

However, unlike a hole in a balloon where all the air rushes out through the hole, Tomich said his synporins channels allow the ions to pump both in and out. For CF patients whose cells cannot produce chloride transporter proteins, that could make a dramatic difference in treatment.

Tomich thought of the application

John Tomich, K-State biochemistry professor, has two patents resulting from his research on cystic fibrosis. He has patented a technique for creating artificial channels in cells to allow negatively charged ions to pass through, assisting cystic fibrosis patients.

MICHAEL YOUNG/Collegian

when he and colleagues published studies on this channel in 1993.

"That got us thinking, 'They are missing this kind of channel. Maybe we could put our artificial one in,'" he said.

Years of experimentation led to an engineered chloride channel derived from brain tissue that assembles itself into cell membranes in respiratory areas and has lasted as long as 24 hours in animal studies. In addition, test animal results from spring and summer 2000 indicate CF mice treated with the artificial channels showed activity and behavior as high as 80 percent of normal mice.

Though chloride concentration in cells seems to influence water flow through cells, important to CF patients that need water to thin and wash out internal mucus, Tomich said the artificial channels also seem to stimulate disease-fighting ability in cells.

"Somehow we're turning on other things, just by changing the chloride concentration," he said.

As a result of these test results, Tomich has been working to get his treatment off the ground by founding a company based on it. Nacelle Therapeutics Inc. was founded last October, though Tomich had been looking at the idea since 1999.

Based in Manhattan for now, Nacelle was founded with the help of the Mid-America Commercialization Corporation, a non-profit corporation that primarily works to adapt K-State technology for commercial use.

Gary Rabold, interim president of Nacelle through the MACC, said his corporation provides working space, seed capital and management support while Tomich establishes his business.

"The front end is always the riskier part," he said.

"Every new business can't hire a CEO from day one."

Tomich's technology was chosen, Rabold said, because it has a strong broad patent and could serve as a platform technology to branch out into stroke and epilepsy treatment.

In the meantime, Tomich has been using his status as a company to apply for larger funds like the Small Business Innovation Research Program through the National Institute of Health. With a potential for a $1.5 million grant, he could proceed through the program's three phases of testing and, if successful, move on to the Food and Drug Administration for human testing.

Rabold said the plan is to evaluate drug candidates over the next two to three years. If Tomich's candidates prove interesting to outside investors, Rabold said the company could license its work out to others, partner with companies or expand on its own outside of the MACC.

Tomich said the technology very well could expand to include stroke and epilepsy treatments to minimize damage. Pharmaceutical companies have been founded on less, he said.

Personally, Tomich said he really is more interested in finding a CF treatment that works.

"I have to be honest and say my goals with this were never financial," he said. "Hopefully, this will be the first therapy that deals with the cause."

In addition, both Tomich and Rabold said they would like to use the business to keep the best and brightest in Manhattan.

"I think it's a crime," Tomich said. "We do a great job of sending all our best minds out of the state."

Meanwhile, Stewart, who had to take 96 pills daily until she was 13, said she hopes Tomich is successful in developing a once-daily treatment.

"A once-a-day pill would be nothing for us," she said.

Stewart, who met Tomich by chance at her job at Peterson Clinical Lab about three years ago, said she admires him. Tomich never lost a relative to CF, she said. He simply wants to help for the sake of helping.

"John has no motivation except his own," she said. "I hope and wish and pray the Cystic Fibrosis Foundation will fund John."

December snow cleanup keeps city workers busy

By JENNIFER O'NEILL
Kansas State Collegian

For the first time in years, Manhattan ended up under a veil of snow, making it hard to climb out.

Cleanup from last month's snowfall kept the city's crews hard at work, at one time, for 24 hours straight.

Mary Knapp, state climatologist, said Manhattan received about 17 inches of snow in 2000 — about 14 inches fell in December alone.

"It's more typical for us to get snow and have it melt a few days later," she said. "For snow to start on the 11th and continue is unusual."

Before the first snow could melt, 5 1/2 inches more fell two days later.

"The problem was, we got a little snow at first," Manhattan mayor Karen McCulloh said.

"It froze, and then we got a ton more before it could melt. Everything worked against us with this snow."

Part of the problem Manhattan had with clearing the snow was when to start. The city's snow ordinance says that removal has to be completed 36 hours after the last measurable snowfall.

Manhattan accumulated another two inches Dec. 14, and three more inches Dec. 18. McCulloh said the snow wasn't completely removed when the storms ended.

McCulloh said she received many phone call complaints from people upset about the inconvenience of the uncleared roads.

"I understood the people's concern, but what surprised me was the businesses that didn't clean up," she said.

The city's cleanup lasted two days, Jerry Petty, director of Public Works, said. He said the problem with clearing the snow had to do with the time and the duration.

"A major part of the snowfall took place when people were getting up and going to work," he said.

"Crews had already been on the job for 10 hours, but because of the time and the severity of the snow, it wasn't visible."

Petty said that when Manhattan got buried with snow Dec. 13 and 14, he had crews working 24 hours straight.

"We were in pretty good shape," he said. "We had eight drivers assigned to two 12-hour shifts, along with a few supervisors."

Manhattan has eight snow trucks equipped with plows and salt spreaders.

Petty says he tends to worry when snow targets a regional area because the ability to get salt can become crucial. Manhattan came close to depleting its supplies.

"Without salt, there's not much we can do when the streets get slick," he said.

McCulloh said the city's next step is to assess the supplies needed, such as more sand and salt. She said the city definitely will go over budget this year due to the unexpected snowfall.

Property owners' non-compliance with the city's snow ordinance also has been an issue, Brad Claussen, building official for Manhattan, said.

"Every time we get a big snow like the one last month, there's a problem getting people to clear their property," he said.

Residential and business owners alike are obligated under the same ordinance to clear sidewalks and pathways within 36 hours of a snowfall.

Claussen said the city is in the process of trying to come up with some ideas on how to get more people to fulfill their responsibilities as property owners.

"As of now, there's no really good enforcement method," he said.

Wefald named Kansan of the Year for improvements

By COLLEEN FOOTE
Kansas State Collegian

After living in Kansas for only 14 years, K-State President Jon Wefald will be honored as Distinguished Kansan of the Year.

On Jan. 26, Native Sons and Daughters of Kansas and Gov. Bill Graves will present Wefald the Distinguished Kansan of the Year award for his contributions to K-State, the state of Kansas and the nation. The recipient of the award does not have to be a native Kansan.

"This award is for somebody who has made a difference for more than 10 years," said Bill Muir, Native Sons president and the assistant to the vice president of institutional advancement at K-State.

"In the 14 years that President Wefald has lived and worked in Kansas, there has been a big turnaround."

Some of the turnarounds Wefald helped create at K-State consist of adding 1.4 million square feet of new university buildings, including a new library, an art museum and a nationally-acclaimed plant science building.

K-State's enrollment has increased from about 15,000 to nearly 22,000 during Wefald's presidency. The university has an economic impact on the state of Kansas of more than $2.5 billion and returns nearly $17 for every $1 of state funding it receives.

"There was no museum on campus before Wefald came to K-State," said Lorne Render, director of the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art. "He and his wife had a vision in seeing that there should be a museum, and they were instrumental in bringing the Beach Museum of Art to K-State."

Few college presidents have ever been as well-recognized nationally for improving both the academic and the athletic programs on campus as Wefald, Muir said.

Wefald, who spent most of his life in Minnesota, said he thinks of himself as a Kansan, even though he has lived here for only 14 years.

"I love this place, and it's become my home," Wefald said. "This award is really special, and I'm very honored and grateful."

Other Kansans to be honored by Native Sons and Daughters of Kansas include former North Carolina basketball coach Dean Smith, former U.S. Senator Nancy Landon Kassebaum Baker and Native Sons and Daughters Executive Director June Windscheffel.

"This award is a neat deal for not only K-Staters, but for all Kansans," Muir said.

Christmas trees used as habitats for fish

■ 900 trees used to house, protect fish in recycling program

By CRISTINA JANNEY
Kansas State Collegian

Where shiny red and gold ornaments once resided, there will be a new home for some Tuttle Creek fish.

Tuttle Creek is accepting Christmas trees for fish habitat as a part of a recycling program.

The trees, which are placed in two to six feet of water, serve as protection for small fish, Chuck Bever, fisheries biologist, said.

These habitats tend to attract two of the most popular sport fish: crappie and large mouth bass, Bever said. However, other fish also will use the habitats.

Eventually, the trees will naturally decay.

Bever said the state park uses about 200 trees a year for fish habitats. The park takes a total of about 300 to 400 trees a year. Those that are not used for fish habitat are chipped for mulch and surfaces for walking trails.

To recycle trees at the park, take them to the River Pond State Park, which is behind the dam. There is a collection area near the beach parking lot.

There is no charge for recycling the trees at the park, and they will be accepted through the end of January, Bever said.

The City of Manhattan also is recycling trees free of charge. Trees can be deposited at Longs Park and will be accepted there at least until the end of January.

The city has accepted 900 trees as of this week, Jerry Dishman, city parks superintendent, said.

Trees collected by the city also are chopped for mulch and surfaces for walking trails. The process is somewhat labor intensive, but the city continues the program.

Several residential trash haulers are accepting trees curbside, but those trees do end up in landfills.

B & L Trash Service will pick up trees, but it encourages its clients to recycle through the city's program. The company does not charge anything for the service unless it is a particularly large tree.

Waste Management-Refuse Control and Arrow Trash Service also take trees, but Arrow charges $3 to $5 for the service.

"If we recycle them, they are not filling up the landfill. We are trying to do the environment some good," Dishman said.

Cats reign in match-up against No. 21 Tennessee

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

DALLAS, Texas — K-State's bowl jinx is finally broken. Heading into Monday's Southwestern Bell Cotton Bowl matchup with No. 21 Tennessee, the Wildcats had never won back-to-back bowl games in seven consecutive tries under head coach Bill Snyder. And coming off a 1999 Culligan Holiday Bowl victory over Washington, No. 11 K-State was presented with the formidable task of preventing history from repeating itself once more.

It didn't. The Cats (11-3) racked up 507 yards of total offense and dropped the Volunteers (8-4) 35-21 on New Year's Day 2001 in front of a sell-out crowd of 63,465 at Cotton Bowl Stadium.

Snyder, who improved his bowl record to 5-3, said he was happy that

K-State was able to reverse its bowl fortunes. "I'm pleased that we won, because this was the eighth consecutive bowl game that we've gone to and we've won every other one, lost every other one, and this was our year to lose," he said. "So we broke the jinx, and I'm just happy about that."

Broken jinx or not, junior linebacker Ben Leber said he knows defeating a team like Tennessee is no modest accomplishment. The Volunteers boast 41 all-time bowl appearances and flaunt the eighth-winningest program in NCAA Division I-A history. Not to mention, they won the national championship trophy just two short years ago.

"It feels great," Leber said. "We knew we had a huge challenge in Tennessee, and everybody had their doubts, but we didn't listen to any of that. We knew if we played our game, this is the type of outcome we thought would happen."

To play its type of game, however, K-State was forced to overcome 29-degree temperatures at the 10 a.m. kickoff, with overnight snow still covering much of the grass surface. That kind of weather condition failed to alter any of the Cats' gameplan, though, Snyder said.

"Our plans remained exactly the same. Cold is cold. Wet is wet. Snow is snow—no matter where you are, who you are," he said. "And we just felt like, yes, we've been there and we've done that and we can play in it."

And play in it they did.

The Cats looked to get on the board early with their special teams unit, but Aaron Lockett's 67-yard punt return for a touchdown six minutes into the first quarter was called back as the officiating crew flagged K-State for an illegal block.

The penalty didn't seem to affect the Cat offense, though, as K-State found the end zone nine plays and 74 yards later, capped by senior quarterback Jonathan Beasley's 14-yard touchdown scramble to give the Cats a 7-0 lead.

Although Tennessee would knot the score two possessions later, K-State would add two Quincy Morgan TD receptions in less than a four minute span to take a 21-7 edge.

Then, after a Volunteer three-and-out, K-State was knocking on the door once again before the intermission. The Cats drove to the Tennessee 26-yard line before Beasley's screen pass to wide-out Mario Fatafehli tries to bring down Tennessee quarterback Casey Clausen in the 65th annual Southwestern Bell Cotton Bowl Classic. Fatafehli finished the game with two tackles.

Martez Wesley was deflected by defensive end Chavis Smith and intercepted by Jabari Greer. Greer took the pick and returned it 78 yards for a UT score, cutting the deficit to 21-14.

At any rate, though, it proved to be the first five minutes of the second half that sealed Tennessee's fate.

K-State's offense dominated the opening drive of the third quarter, charging 75 yards in five plays, all on the ground, capped by Josh Scobey's 12-yard touchdown on the option.

Then, on the Volunteers' ensuing possession, free safety Jon McGraw intercepted QB Casey Clausen's play action pass on 2nd-and-21 and returned it 47 yards to the UT 28-yard line. Three plays and 45 seconds later, Scobey found the end zone once more on the option, this time from six yards out, as K-State extended its lead to 35-14.

Tennessee tailback Travis Henry would counter with a breakaway 81-yard TD run with less than three minutes to play in the fourth quarter, but it wasn't enough, as the Cats avenged their 1997 Cotton Bowl loss to Brigham Young with a win over the Volunteers.

After the game, Beasley had nothing but positives to say about K-State's efforts.

"I'd like to congratulate Kansas State," he said. "I thought they did a great job of taking a plan and executing it, and basically taking us out behind the woodshed and spanking us."

Regardless of how that spanking came about, however, Beasley said the victory alone should quiet some of the criticism surrounding K-State football.

"I think it's big for this program, beating a great traditioned team like Tennessee," Beasley said Monday. "A lot of people didn't think we could do that. A lot of people said K-State can't play in big games, against big teams or big conferences, and today we went out and proved that we could."

Besides, with the struggles the Cats endured this season, a New Year's Day bowl victory was just that much sweeter, McGraw said.

"We dealt with so much adversity, losing to Oklahoma twice and (Texas) A&M, and it felt like an emotional roller coaster," he said. "But then to come back and finish like we did, it's a sweet feeling."

Along with that feeling came a sense of accomplishment, as 25 seniors who made the trip to Dallas ended their K-State careers winning 44 games in the past four seasons, making them perhaps the most successful senior class in Wildcat history.

That fact leaves senior Randall Cummins in a sense of awe.

"We've won 11 games for the fourth year in a row and to do that as a senior is a great feeling," he said. "There's not even words to describe it."

K-State's 297 rushing yards break team bowl record

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's uniforms might be purple, but after the Cats' rushing display in the Southwestern Bell Cotton Bowl, they might have had Tennessee seeing red — the color of the Nebraska Cornhuskers, who ran roughshod over the Volunteers in two of their past three bowls.

Taking a page out of the Husker playbook, K-State ran the option, and ran the option, and ran the option some more against a Tennessee defense that never caught on, offensive guard Andy Eby said.

"We found in film that they were susceptible to the option, and we just ran that play over and over and over again," he said. "They really couldn't figure out a way to stop it."

As a result, the Cats racked up 297 yards rushing against the third-ranked rush defense in the nation, shattering the K-State bowl rushing record of 227 yards against Wyoming in the 1993 Copper Bowl. Tailback Josh Scobey's 147 yards rushing broke the K-State record for individual yards rushing, previously maintained by J.J. Smith's 133 yards against Wyoming, and quarterback Jonathan Beasley set a new career high with 98 yards rushing.

The Cats' ground attack was most effective early in the third quarter, when they jumped to a 35-14 lead. In the Cats' first two drives of the half, they scored two touchdowns by running the ball 10 consecutive times for 103 yards. By mixing the option in with hand-offs to Scobey right up the gut of the Volunteer defense, K-State kept the Vols completely off-balance, Tennessee defensive lineman John Henderson said.

"We were trying to stop the option and while we were doing that they were running up the middle," he said. "We got a little confused here and there. We weren't ready. We were physically ready, but we weren't mentally ready."

The fact that Tennessee wasn't prepared to defend the option was clearly evident to the Cats, who took full advantage of the Vols' confusion, Scobey said.

"I think they were kind of confused. I think they were kind of on roller skates, not knowing which way we were going, what we were doing," he said. "We were mixing them up a lot, and they didn't really know what was going on. We were able to run right over them."

"I felt like they sat back to kind of see what we were going to do, and they sat back and waited too long."

Still, however, the fact remains that this was no ordinary defense K-State was steamrolling. Prior to the Cotton Bowl, Tennessee had allowed just 74 yards rushing per game, and K-State surpassed that number in both the first and third quarters alone. As a result, the Tennessee defense was left not only confused but also surprised.

"I was surprised that they ran that well — I'll say that. They did a great job. You have to give them an awful lot of credit," Tennessee head coach Phil Fulmer said. "Their fullback's a really good player. Their tailback runs hard. They did a nice job with their schemes. The option gets you running a little bit along the lateral side on occasions, which helps things. They did a heck of a job running the football today."

The Volunteers weren't the only ones left scratching their heads, though. Several K-State players were surprised as well.

"Honestly, I was. I think they were top five against rushing on defense, and to be able to run for nearly three hundred yards on them, it's just amazing," center Randall Cummins said.

Scobey, on the other hand, knew K-State was capable of such a performance. In fact, he took all the hype over the Tennessee defense as motivation for himself.

"I think we can play great and move the ball against anyone. There's a lot of doubters out there, but I just keep on rolling," Scobey said. "When people doubt me, that just keeps me motivated."

Turnovers plague Cats in 67-58 loss

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

LINCOLN, Neb.—Six and a half minutes into the first half, K-State had more turnovers (10) than points (9), yet only trailed the Cornhuskers by two points.

Despite its early good fortune, however, the Cats' penchant for losing the ball eventually would prove to be their demise, and Nebraska would win the game, 67-58.

With just over a minute remaining in the first half, though, the game was tied up. Then a K-State defensive miscue and a turnover led to consecutive Husker baskets and allowed Nebraska to enter halftime leading, 37-33.

"I think in the first half they were effective in just extending the floor, rushed our entry a little bit, got us a little rattled," head coach Deb Patterson said. "And when you leave the half with 17 turnovers, personally, I'm shocked you're even in the basketball game, and to have only a 4-point deficit at that point, I thought to an extent, we weathered the storm."

The storm, however, was just beginning, as the Huskers would allow K-State just one field goal in the first six minutes of the second half.

On offense, Nebraska was able to patiently find open baskets despite having their best scorer completely shut down.

Entering the contest, 6-foot-5-inch center Casey Leonhardt had averaged nearly 14 points per game. Faced with the defense of K-State's freshman center Nicole Ohlde, however, Leonhardt didn't score in the first half.

"In practice, we talked about fronting her, and we always wanted to have help side behind her, so I just think a lot of that contributed to shutting her down," Ohlde said.

In addition to shining defensively, the 6-foot-5-inch Ohlde also was the Cats' most potent offensive threat of the night, scoring 16 points. Although giving up a considerable amount in size department to the much larger Leonhardt, Ohlde was able to cut, drive and glide her way through the lane, around defenders to the basket.

The second half went much differently for Ohlde and K-State, however. Ohlde struggled offensively in the second period, as the Huskers, and Leonhardt, had much more success keeping Ohlde away from the basket. As a result, K-State's shooting plummeted from 47.6 percent in the first half to 28.8 percent in the second half.

"I was getting some good looks — they just weren't falling," Ohlde said. "I think I need to keep my composure because I wasn't really handling the ball very well when I got in the post, and I think that had a lot to do with it."

Senior guard Kim Woodlee also, at times, gave the Cats an offensive spark, hitting four treys and scoring 20 points. For the majority of the game, though, Woodlee and all of the Cat guards just couldn't get shots to fall.

"I think I had a lot of great looks. I had plenty of time several times to get shots off that didn't fall, and that's just where I need to tighten my game up and make shots," Woodlee said.

Defensively, however, the K-State guards had difficulty guarding the overall quicker Nebraska lineup. Especially hard on the Cats was the matchup of guard Kristin Rethman and Nebraska forward Greichaly Cepero. Rethman gave up four inches to the quicker, bigger player, and as a result, Cepero was able to juke her way into several baskets in the paint.

"She was a big factor in the game because she was effective in disrupting timing. She was aggressive of the dribble," Patterson said of Cepero. "I just thought she brought a real athletic dimension that helped change the game, in the second half particularly."

"She's a tough matchup for us, and I think she'll be a tough matchup for any team that doesn't bring a comparable athlete to the floor."

K-State center Nicole Ohlde drives around Nebraska forward Paige Sutton during the first half Wednesday night in Lincoln, Neb., at the Bob Devaney Sports Center. Ohlde had 14 points in the first half with a half-time score of 37-33 Nebraska.

STEVEN DEARINGER/
Collegian

K-State's quickness problem was compounded with the foul trouble of point guard Shalondra Booker, who caught two early fouls in the first half and was forced to sit the bench for extended periods of time throughout the rest of the game.

"As early as she got her first two fouls, it rattled her just a little bit and I think rattled us," Patterson said.

"I think what was more significant was just our second half lack of conversions on the offensive end of the floor. We improved relative to a game ago, relative to execution, but we still didn't finish."

Athletics department to receive about $1.16 million in bowl payments

By NICK BRATKOVIC
Kansas State Collegian

The Big 12 Conference will receive $2.3 million for K-State's New Year's Day appearance in the Southwestern Bell Cotton Bowl Classic.

K-State Associate Athletic Director Bob Cavello said Wednesday the K-State Department of Intercollegiate Athletics will receive approximately $1.16 million for expenses from the conference and one-twelfth of the remaining payout.

"I liken our expenses to if you were going to move a small army out of town for a few days, and you had to account for the different expenses," Cavello said. "So this system was put in to cover the expense of a bowl trip."

Expenses include a $925,000 base allocation fee, along with reimbursement for nautical air miles one way and revenue from tickets sold.

It is a system, Cavello said, that was developed by the conference a couple of years ago to distribute the post-season funds from football.

"We did it different the first couple of years because the old Big 8 had one way of doing it, and Southwest Conference had another way," he said. "It was developed to keep one program from losing a lot of money and another from making a lot of money. It is sort of a system of checks and balances."

The checks and balances factor is due to the location of a bowl game. In 1999 the K-State ticket office sold 8,000 tickets for the Culligan Holiday Bowl. This year it sold 16,000 tickets to the Cotton Bowl. As a result, ticket sales produced more revenue from the Cotton Bowl. However nautical air miles to the Cotton Bowl were down.

"Location makes a big difference in all of this," said Carol Adolph, K-State athletic department ticket manager. "The Cotton Bowl this year was on New Year's Day, so some people could have gone and not missed any work at all."

Cavello said K-State, in its contract with the Cotton Bowl, had to sell 12,000 tickets and would receive 50 percent of the revenue after it sold 6,000 tickets. However, he said the cutoff for profits was 2,000 tickets, and no profits were received beyond that.

The 16,000 tickets sold by the department are the highest total since the 1997 Tostitos Fiesta Bowl, when 23,000 tickets were sold. For this year the total revenue from ticket sales to the game for K-State was about $161,000, Cavello said.

Additional tickets were sold through the game, but Southwestern Bell Cotton Bowl president Rick Baker said it is unclear how many tickets were sold to K-State fans. He did say that bowl officials considered the game a success and that the amount of fans K-State brought to the game makes K-State a more attractive bowl team.

"There is no doubt with the great following K-State has that those kind of passionate fans, and with people like Max Urick and Dr. Jon Wefald and Coach Bill Snyder, that they are attractive school to invite to a bowl game," Baker said.

In addition to money generated from playing in the Cotton Bowl,

K-State also receives funds from the other bowl games Big 12 schools participate in. As a result of past budgets and projections, Cavello said there is not a great deal of extra money produced from playing in the Cotton Bowl. That money would come from playing in a Bowl Championship Series Bowl game, or the conference having two teams in the series.

"That is an extra $600,000 for each school if we get two teams in the BCS Bowl," Cavello said. "That is a big chunk of change if you can get another team in the BCS. That is why you get conferences like the Pac Ten this year lobbying so hard for the BCS."

Columnist forgets making resolutions for himself, looks toward sports world

It's now 12 days into 2001, and I'm feeling bad because I haven't made any New Year's resolutions — not any that I intend to keep, anyway.

Oh sure, I tell my friends that I'm going to work out at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex regularly, and that I'm not going to eat at Burger King and Taco Bell every single day at the K-State Student Union, that I'm never going to use Febreeze again and that I will get my own Collegian before class instead of trying to read the paper of the very annoyed person beside me.

I promised all that to myself, and I will fail miserably.

Last year I wasn't going to order pizza delivery for an entire semester. Needless to say, that didn't happen.

So this year, I'm not going to try and improve myself. No, this year I'm going to improve the others around me by making their resolutions for them. I know they'll thank me later.

1. The NCAA resolves to force Notre Dame to become the 14th member of the the Mid-American conference.

Playing the likes of Akron and Ball State, the Irish's strength of schedule reaches triple digits and they must play in the Motor City for a payout of approximately $45.

2. The Nebraska football team resolves to never again run up the score on anybody. Head coach Frank Solich will issue an apology to Northwestern for calling a half-back pass to starting wide receiver Matt Davison while leading 52-17. From now on, for every point Nebraska leads an opponent by, the Huskers must substitute a player on the field with a cheerleader.

3. K-State, on the other hand, resolves to quit running the quarterback draw every time it takes a 10 point lead.

If head coach Bill Snyder refuses, former Cat quarterback Brian Kavanaugh, one of the slowest Division I athletes in history, will be given an extra year of eligibility and the starting position at QB.

4. K-State fans resolve to actually attend men's basketball games.

The next time the attendance at Bramlage Coliseum drops below 8,000, employees of K-State Parking Services will be enlisted to break into students' residences and drag those students to the game.

5. K-State fans also resolve to attend women's basketball games. In turn, in an effort to increase attendance, 6-foot, 4-inch freshman forward Nicole Ohlde resolves to dunk the ball at least once per game.

6. The University of Kansas basketball team resolves to lose in Bramlage Coliseum, no matter how K-State plays. Jeff Boschee, the Jayhawks' sharpshooting guard who recently decided to stop shaving his head, resolves to grow his hair out and have it permed.

7. In an effort to prove how trendy it is, K-State resolves to never again show that commercial with the shirtless guy who has painted his entire body purple. And I do mean that I never want to see that on television ever, ever again.

8. Finally, the intramural basketball officials at the Rec resolve to only call fouls on the people guarding me — I, on the other hand, will be allowed to hack away with impunity.

The same goes for traveling, double dribble and three-in-the-lane. Those rules will apply only to the other team.

Also, the opposing players will resolve not to laugh when I shoot, dribble or pass.

That should pretty much take care of my New Year's resolutions. The world will be a better place if the items on this list are taken to heart. Especially the last one.

Longhorns' 2nd-half surge downs Cats 63-41 in Austin

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

K-State headed into Wednesday night's matchup with Texas looking for its first 2-0 league start since the 1992-93 campaign after snapping an 11-game road losing streak last Saturday against Texas A&M.

But the Longhorns weren't cooperating.

No. 23 Texas (12-2, 2-0), despite a season-low 17 percent (6-of-36) shooting in the first half, bounced back in the final 20 minutes to down the Wildcats (7-6, 1-1) 63-41 at the Frank Erwin Center in Austin, Texas.

Chris Owens led the Horns with 14 points and 15 rebounds in extending Texas' winning streak to seven games, its longest in three seasons under head coach Rick Barnes.

However, Texas looked far from a team on a streak in the first half of play. In fact, the Horn crowd, which traditionally remains on its feet until Texas scores its first points, had to stand nearly four minutes Wednesday.

Such struggles seemed to wear off on the Cats as well, as five minutes into the game, both squads had combined for just four points and seven fouls. The two squads would finish the half shooting 11-of-59 from the field.

Texas kept a narrow 20-16 advantage at the break, as K-State guard Phineas Atchison drilled a last second three-pointer from the right wing.

Nevertheless, the Cats would fail to ride that momentum into the second half.

Instead, it was the Horns who came alive in the final period, connecting on 55 percent (15-of-27) of their shots, including 6-of-11 beyond the three-point arc.

Texas, thanks to an early five-minute, 12-0 run, jumped out to a quick edge after the intermission and led by double-figures the rest of the game, while enjoying a 49-32 advantage on the glass for the contest.

"We were inept offensively," Cat head coach Jim Woodridge said. "I thought we played pretty well defensively in the first half, but rebounding was a problem throughout the game. We knew Texas was a good defensive team, but I didn't foresee us not making any shots at all."

Atchison returned from an injury Wednesday to lead K-State with 11 points, but his backcourt Mandy Johnston, sophomore in business management, cuts the hair of Jason Goodman, senior in marketing, Tuesday afternoon at Hayne's Style Shop and Supply. Johnston is working her way through school by cutting hair.

STORY BY JJ DUNCAN

a cut above the rest

Student hair stylists juggle schedules to fit in school, work her carefully styled hair and the smile on her face as she talks to a client makes Mandy Johnston look just like any other hairdresser as her scissors send hair floating to the floor.

Money will be tight for the next few weeks, though, she said, because while she's working as a full time stylist at Hayne's Style Shop and Supply, she just had to pay tuition and buy books. Unlike most hairdressers, the job is paying Johnston's way through college.

"Since I'm living in Manhattan I figured I should take advantage of the campus and further my education because I want to own my beauty shop someday," Johnston, sophomore in business management, said.

Johnston graduated from Crum's Beauty College in spring 1996 and began attending K-State in fall 1998. She said she had always planned to go to college after she was done with beauty school and she is glad to be following through with that plan.

Johnston said being a hair stylist is a good way to work through college because of the flexible hours and also because it pays better than most jobs people work while going to school.

"At Hayne's I'm considered self-employed because I pay rent on my space, so I can schedule appointments around my classes, which helps a lot," she said.

Schedule flexibility also helped Ted Hartke, owner of Gallery for Hair, work around school when he began to put himself through K-State while working as a stylist.

"I worked for two different salons while I was going to school that were very willing to work with me as a college student," he said. "The fact that I could create a schedule around school was great since basically, I was working full time and going to school part time."

Hartke attended K-State for two years before starting cosmetology school. After graduating in 1983, he went right back to college while working as a stylist. In 1989, he graduated with a bachelor's degree in life science, and it wasn't long before Hartke owned Gallery for Hair.

Fortunately, he had support from his parents at first, but he felt good about becoming more independent as he worked as a stylist, he said.

"My parents wanted me to finish college, so we made a deal that if I went to cosmetology school, then I had to go back to college after I graduated," he said. "I had always had my parents behind me, which I started to feel guilty about. So eventually I was supporting myself through working as a stylist."

Hartke said it always had been his goal to own a salon, and it is a great sense of accomplishment to have a successful salon, especially after trying out so many different things in college.

Hartke said he was at K-State for so long because he was attending part time, and he changed his major five times to try to find something that suited him. By the time he graduated, he had built a large and loyal enough clientele that he felt ready to open a salon, he said.

Working as a stylist through college means working in a college town, which has positives and negatives, Hartke said.

He said he was able to build clientele from students in the classes he was taking, which helped quite a bit. However, during the summer, business slows down and many clients disappear until the fall.

Another positive aspect of having a large population of students is that there are many people who keep current on trends, so it keeps stylists on top of the latest looks, Hartke said. Often times people bring in pictures of famous people they want to model their hair after, he said.

"Lately, we see a lot of pictures of Meg Ryan and Cameron Diaz from girls who want that shag look, and thank God Jennifer Aniston finally changed her hair style because we have been seeing pictures of her forever," he said. "For guys, we actually see pictures of Ricky Martin and the guys from NSync, so music artists are often on the cutting edge of things."

Having a great deal of young people to work with means a stylist is less likely to fall into a routine of doing the same haircut over and over, said Sasha Larson, student at Crum's Beauty College.

"Working with a college-age crowd, your clients usually want more up-to-date looks and more people are willing to try new things," she said.

Larson said that after attending K-State for a year, she is doing what she really wants, which is learning to become a stylist. She feels more ambition to work as a stylist because she enjoys working with many different people and trying new techniques.

Johnston said she enjoys the one-on-one interaction she has with her clients and the chance she has to express her artistic talent, while at the same time being able to make people feel better about themselves. Johnston said she hopes getting her degree will give her the edge she needs to open a salon, she said.

"If I could own my own salon, this is something I could see myself doing for a long time, but I can't see myself behind the chair forever," she said. "Not many stylists go through 70 lock changes in different dorms."

Winter break experience was not lost for Harder due to his job, though. He said he was able to spend several days with his parents over Christmas, and was able to travel to Dallas with some friends for the New Year.

"My boss was great about letting me have some time off," Harder said. "He was really flexible and let me have some time off, but I was still able to make some money."

Harder said he deals with a lot of problems throughout the year as a locksmith, from people putting super glue in locks to people being locked out of their rooms at all hours of the day.

"Either my boss or I are on call 24 hours a day," Harder said. "We have a lot more urgent things to take care of when students are on campus. We get a lot of dirty looks because we have woke people up during the school year, so that is why we try to get as much done as we can during break."

Although he did not get to sleep in much over his winter break, Harder said he was glad he was able to make some money over break and help out his boss.

"I really did like being here," Harder said. "I was able to catch up, relax and make some money."

door. Another concern is the lack of space for wheelchairs inside the hall. The only seating available for the wheelchairs is in the very front.

"We want to give them access to the regular entrance and for them to be able to set anywhere they want," Walker said. "We know this is a concern, and we want to address it."

Bernard Pitts, director of the Union, said he agrees.

"We have a responsibility to provide our facilities to anyone — despite limitations," Pitts said. "Several students do not have access to Forum Hall because of the limitations it presents. We want to change that, but we do not have the funds to do what is recommended to the room. My only option is to go to the Privilege Fee Committee and generate funds that way."

Gretchen Holden, director of disabled support services, said she is happy to see the committee taking some action on the problem.

"It is very time consuming for the student," she said. "If a disabled student wants to come to an event in Forum Hall, most have to arrive one to two hours early just to go through all the steps to try to get in. That is not fair to the students."

Holden said she has heard many student complaints because of the problem.

"Of course they complain," she said. "We just had a major renovation of the Union, and the students paid for it, and yet they can't use Forum Hall. They are very unhappy. Honestly, this is a compliance issue, and we are lucky that we have students who are patient with us."

airline industry, each with roughly 25 percent of the domestic market. No. 3 Delta has 15 percent.

Even before the agreements were announced, some consumer advocates warned that approval of the deals would mean fewer choices, worse service and higher fares for travelers.

"If they all go through, it'll mean the end of the era of competition among airlines," said Paul Hudson, executive director of the nonprofit Aviation Consumer Action Project.

In addition, having 51 percent of seats in the hands of two carriers makes the country more vulnerable to the labor troubles that have occurred regularly in aviation, said

Ed Perkins, consumer advocate for the American Society of Travel Agents.

American chairman and chief executive Donald J. Carty said at a news conference in New York that the deal gives American "a level of growth that otherwise take us years to achieve."

American would add TWA's hub in St. Louis to its hubs in Dallas-Fort Worth and Chicago and greatly increase its presence in busy East Coast cities including New York and Washington.

"The agreement will protect air service in St. Louis and maintain St. Louis' role as a major transportation center," TWA said in a statement. "The agreement also calls for American to offer employment to almost all of TWA's 20,000 employees."

The deal would bring an end to TWA, which traces its roots to the 1925 founding of Western Air Express.

The nation's eighth-largest carrier has failed to turn a profit since 1988 and has filed for bankruptcy twice before.

It might have finally made money if fuel prices had not almost doubled last year. Instead, TWA lost $115.1 million through the first three quarters of 2000. In 1999, the carrier's $353 million loss made it the only major airline not to show a profit.

TWA's decision to seek a white knight came after the airline started the fourth quarter with just $157 million in cash. Carty acknowledged that another company could bid for TWA, but said there was a $75 million breakup fee as part of the agreement between TWA and American.

Tobacco industry settlements cut

By TIMOTHY D. MAY
The Associated Press

HARRISBURG, Pa. — The most recent payments to 16 of the 46 states that settled lawsuits with the tobacco industry were cut by a total of almost $200 million.

Officials in some of the states say they already are planning measures to obtain the money, which was set aside in escrow.

The payments were cut because those states and five American territories failed to pass a law, required by the settlement, that is designed to protect the tobacco companies from losing too much market share to other manufacturers.

The industry feared that the nonparticipating manufacturers might gain an advantage because they would not be restricted by the settlement's ban on billboard advertising and other marketing tactics, such as cartoon images like Joe Camel.

In all, the tobacco industry withheld $197 million from last month's biannual payment. California's December payment was $44 million less than it expected. Pennsylvania's was $19 million lower. Delaware took a hit of $900,000.

"We are dealing with such enormous figures here, that what appears to be a fairly small shift ends up being a relatively big adjustment," said lawyer Sue Ellen Wooldridge, who represents the National Association of Attorneys General. The group is working with states to get the money back.

Previous settlement payments from the tobacco industry to the states — expected to total about $206 billion over the next 25 years — have been lower than projected due to declines in the volume of cigarettes shipped, slower sales and inflation.

Payment amounts are determined by an independent auditor, not by the industry, said Tom Ryan, a spokesman for Philip Morris U.S.A.

Under the settlement, withheld money will remain in escrow until an independent market analyst determines how much, if any, market share the industry has lost, according to attorneys for the attorney generals' association.

It was unclear how long that might take, they said.

Some states, including Pennsylvania, are considering litigation challenging whether any market share was lost.

"We're confident we'll prevail," said Sean Connolly, a spokesman for the Pennsylvania attorney general.

Recreational Services' Office Located in Peters Recreation Complex

Now that the holidays are over and it is time to get going with those New Year's Resolutions, why not find an aerobics class to join? Recreational Services offers 14 different sessions of aerobics. They range from Aqua Aerobics to Advanced Step. This ensures that every need is met when it comes to the type of aerobics someone wants to take part in. Over 30 years of research has shown that aerobic exercise is one of the best things you can do for your health and well-being.

Aerobics conditions your heart and lungs, as well as help control weight and reduce stress levels. "Word of mouth and the abundance of classes offered has really helped the aerobics program here at the Rec to become so popular," said Amanda Forsyth, Graduate Assistant for Fitness and Wellness at the Rec. Some of the most popular aerobics classes offered at the Rec are Fit Flex, Kardio Kick, Jump Start and Power Step. "Aerobics is popular for a variety of reasons. One of the biggest reasons is that it combines both the social and physical fitness aspect.

You are able to work out with your friends in an atmosphere that offers experienced instructors and intense levels of fitness," said Forsyth. The concept of aerobics was pioneered by Dr. Kenneth H. Cooper and popularized by his books that were published in 1968 and 1977. However, it was Jane Fonda that created the aerobics craze in the 80s and paved the way for aerobics as we think of them today. Most of us have some recollection of seeing Jane in her leg warmers and headband counting and jumping around at some point and time. "Ever since Jane Fonda's era, aerobics have continued to grow and expand," said Forsyth. "Today they include steps, weights, kickboxing and toning exercises, compared to what was once basically a dance routine." So, whether you are in perfect shape or not-so-perfect shape, the Rec has an aerobic program that is designed just for you.

My Favorite Workout

Carla Sonoda has been using the Rec since she came to Manhattan in August. In fact, she was barely unpacked when she began her routine of coming to work out at least three times each week. Sonoda, a native of Sao Paulo, Brazil, came to Manhattan after living in Georgia. "They have a nice facility down there, but this one is better," said Sonoda, "and the aerobics sessions are much better." Sonoda participates in the aerobics sessions offered here at the Rec each week, with her favorite class being IM Step. She enjoys coming so she can see and meet new people. The Rec is close to her house, so she can walk over and enjoy the aerobics sessions every opportunity she has. "It is nice to come and get a good workout. The classes are good and are only one hour," said Sonoda. Sonoda has been working out for about six years because she felt the need to get in shape. In fact, she wants to encourage others to get into a routine as well. "Come to the Rec, it is a great place to be. Working out is a great way to relax and enjoy yourself."

Aerobics at the Rec

Words of Wellness

We do not stop playing because we grow old; we grow old because we stop playing.

Stacy Williams, senior in Kinesiology, has been instructing aerobics at the Rec for the past three years. After attending classes her freshman year, she was asked if she would like to become an instructor. "The Rec is the best place," said Williams. "The environment is great and the people are all so fun and nice." Williams instructs three different sessions at the Rec, including Kardio Kick, Intermediate Step and Advanced Step. She is AFA certified. Working at the Rec has also allowed Williams to learn a little more about herself as well. "I feel like I have really grown as a person since I have been here so long," said Williams, "and I definitely want to take advantage of the facility while I can." Williams will be graduating in May 2001. After graduation, she plans to attend Physical Therapy School. While she is in PT school, she would like to continue teaching aerobics. Williams has a positive outlook on life and owes that to the philosophy she has created for herself and wants to tell others. "Always try to make the best of every situation, and try to enjoy yourself no matter what." Williams is from Olathe, Kansas.

"Exercise is a very important part of my life," said Shelly Haynes, fifth year senior in Rhetoric Speech Communication. This is an understatement, considering this Kansas City native has been instructing various aerobics sessions for the past six and one-half years. Haynes teaches four different classes at the Rec, including Kardio Kick, Advanced Step, Fit Flex and Abs/Back. She admits that Kardio Kick and Fit Flex are her favorites. Haynes is AFA certified, so she can instruct all sessions. "I enjoy working at the Rec because it gives me the opportunity to instruct large numbers of people instead of just a few," said Haynes. Haynes will graduate in May 2001. She plans to move back to Kansas City, where she will resume instructing aerobics at the same health club she worked at during high school and during breaks while in college. She is also planning to be married in August. "I really like working at the Rec because all of the other staff members are so nice," said Haynes. "It has also taught me time management between work and going to school." Haynes also has some advice for both Rec-goers and non-Rec-goers: "Exercise helps keep a balance in your life, both physically and mentally. More people should exercise and they would have a lot more energy."

Tips to lower costs

- Clean or replace furnace filters once a month as needed.
- Set thermostat at 68 degrees and lower it five to seven degrees at night. Each degree below 68 can decrease costs by 2 to 5 percent.
- If gone overnight or during the day, don't turn the heat off. It takes more energy to completely reheat a house than to maintain heat.
- Lower thermostat on water heater — 120 degrees to an efficient setting.
- Weatherstrip all exterior doors and windows.
- Place plastic over windows and seal all four edges.
- On sunny days, open drapes and curtains. On cloudy days and at night, keep them closed.
- Wash lightly soiled clothes of all colors in cold water to avoid the cost of re-heating water.
- Arrange furniture away from walls and windows.
- Use a humidifier — moist air feels warmer than dry air.

Natural gas prices go higher yet

By JESSICA PITTS
Kansas State Collegian

Officials at Kansas Gas Services said natural gas rates are expected to rise 20 percent statewide next month, and for many K-State students, this could mean a shock when they get next month's bill.

The combined effect of the rate hike and the increased usage is expected to nearly double the cost of heating area homes.

KGS spokesman Steve Johnson said the increase is because of recent icy weather and tight supplies, and it gets even worse when one combines the substantial increase in usage since this has been one of the coldest winters.

With the rise in rates, Manhattan residents will be paying $8.16 per 1,000 cubic feet of natural gas used, up from the $6.62 per 1,000 cubic feet they paid in December.

To combat the high heating cost, many students are taking precautionary measures. Jake Clasen, junior in wildlife biology, said he and his five roommates have started to prepare for the higher heating bill.

"We put plastic on the windows of the house, and we put a blanket in the doorway because of the cold draft," Clasen said. "This helps keep the cold out a little bit, so we are able to turn our heater down."

The roommates try to keep their heater set at a constant 62 degrees, which they say helps keep the bills down.

"Last month our bill was only around $155, which is good for as big as our house is," Clasen said. "To be honest, though, it does get a little cold in here."

Clasen said he is concerned about the projected increase, but said he feels he already has taken all the measures he can.

"I just hope it is not too high," he said. "It helps having several people who live together that all split the bill."

Tami Mears, sophomore in pre-veterinary medicine, said her December heating bill was around $150 for her two-bedroom trailer house.

"It is a little bit higher than normal," she said. "I have noticed a steady increase in the bills over the last few months."

She said she also is aware of the projected increase and already is starting to prepare.

"We are talking about putting plastic on the windows to help keep the heat in," Mears said. "We also keep the heater set on 70 degrees to help keep the temperature constant, which hopefully will keep our bill down."

Vigil begins MLK week festivities

By NANCY HULL
Kansas State Collegian

The memory and contributions of civil rights leader Martin Luther King Jr. will be honored by K-State with its annual week of events for the campus and community.

Martin Luther King Jr. Observance Week will begin Saturday and end Jan. 20.

This year's theme is "Remember, Celebrate, Act." Darlene Duckworth, committee co-chair, said the purpose of the week is reflected in the theme. Duckworth, staff assistant in the Office of Diversity and Dual Career Development, said she hopes those who celebrate his legacy will take an active role in promoting and continuing it.

"This is a week for people to recognize his contributions to social justice and the civil rights movement," she said.

On Saturday evening, the events will begin with a community celebration at Manhattan High School's East Campus.

Community Service Program's "Day of Service" on Monday encourages area residents to spend the day doing volunteer community service. More than 10 local agencies are sponsoring projects.

Alpha Phi Alpha is sponsoring a memorial walk and candlelight vigil Monday evening, and a hot chocolate reception will follow. Carlos Etter, chairman of the vigil, said the vigil is the only student-run event of the week.

"This is a chance for different organizations to show union," Etter said.

Author and journalist Farai Chideya will deliver the week's keynote lecture at 10:30 a.m. Thursday in McCain Auditorium. A book signing will follow Chideya's lecture, "The Color of Our Future."

Ongoing events throughout the month include African-American poster presentations at the College of Engineering Complex atrium and a display in the Multicultural Resource and Research Center in Hale Library.

GO ICE SKATING

Rink hours are 3:30 p.m. to 6 p.m. Monday and Tuesday, 3:30 p.m. to 8 p.m. Wednesday through Friday and 1 p.m. to 6 p.m. Saturday and Sunday.

Indoor ice rink draws skaters of all ages

By AMY MORGAN
Kansas State Collegian

Jared Busenitz, sophomore in horticulture, has been ice skating since he was about 4 years old. Busenitz grew up skating on roller blades and ice ponds.

"It's kind of a family thing," he said. During his freshman year, Busenitz was in search of a job. He discovered the Manhattan Parks and Recreation Indoor Ice Rink as he was driving around Manhattan City Park and decided to apply.

Busenitz supervises the ice rink and gives pointers to children who might need it. He also teaches hockey and ice skating lessons. "It's a great job — the best there is," Busenitz said.

Busenitz said he likes his job because it is laid back, and he enjoys skating.

"There are lots of regulars," he said. "It's a big after-school activity."

Eric Morgan, sophomore in business administration, works at the rink, and said many children go there after school because it provides them with something fun to do while their parents run errands or go shopping.

"It's a safe place for the kids to go," Mike Buchanan, recreation supervisor, said.

Busenitz said he enjoys working with the children he supervises and skates with because it makes his job worthwhile. Plus, he said, he gets to know them while having fun.

It costs $3 per person to skate for the entire day, which helps many of the after-school children.

Because of the cost and atmosphere, the rink also is a popular recreational location for church groups, scouting events and school and campus organizations, Buchanan said.

Cody Sudmeier, senior in finance, and former Delta Chi fraternity recruitment chairman, planned a hockey event for his fraternity at the rink.

"I heard there was an ice rink and thought the guys would enjoy playing," Sudmeier said.

Buchanan said they offer both ice skating and hockey lessons for all ages, which is one more aspect that attracts people to the rink.

Jammie Rubio, senior in psychology and political science, said she enjoys the rink and tells others about it.

"I recommend this to friends and couples," she said. "It's nice for a town like Manhattan to offer this type of activity."

Tuition, salaries among topics addressed in annual speech

By JAMIE BARRETT
Kansas State Collegian

The ability for K-State to set its own tuition rates might be in the near future, according to Gov. Bill Graves in his State of the State Address delivered Monday.

In the address, Graves proposed a 6.2-percent salary increase for faculty members and the possibility of a new $3 million agriculture research facility on campus. Graves raised the total higher education budget by 3 percent over last year's budget, leaving K-State with an operating budget of $151.4 million.

John Struve, director of the budget office, said although many good things were proposed in the address, there were several needs that were not met by the state.

"There were several things we needed that were not allocated for," Struve said. "All regents universities requested almost $1 million in utility funding, and that was not brought forth. We also requested that the state match us 2-1 for every credit hour students pay for to aid in the technology match program, and the governor did not recommend this, either."

Struve said in the governor's recommendations, $2.1 million dollars in university funding was not covered and another $1.5 million in utilities funding was not recommended, leaving a gaping hole in the university budget.

"If we do not have this funding, we will just have to cut from every department," Struve said. "At this point, we do not have the capability to absorb such big cuts without problems."

Student Body President Jake Worcester said he is concerned about budgeting that was not covered in the address.

"The budget is not nearly as good," Worcester said. "We are going to try to work with the legislature and convince them of some of the needs we have."

Worcester said one thing K-State hopes to argue for is funding for Hale Library that was not recommended.

"K-State asked for the state to match student fees 2-1 to give some extra money to the library," he said. "There is currently $1 per credit hour attached to student fees. We asked in our requests for them to

QUESTION OF THE WEEK

The Collegian will answer inquiries from students or faculty on any topic about K-State or the City of Manhattan in each Friday paper. Questions can be e-mailed to the Online News editor Jamie Barrett at jb7883@ksu.edu. Please keep questions simple, and stick to relevant topics.

Online Collegian server inaccessible Thursday

Those attempting to access the Electronic Collegian online at www.kstatecollegian.com Thursday morning and afternoon might have had some difficulty.

CampusEngine, the company contracted to provide the eCollegian server space and technical support, declared bankruptcy over winter break, and the server that houses the site and the publishing tool was down Wednesday night through Thursday afternoon.

The online staff is working to prevent such occurrences in the future, and we thank our readers for their patience as we work to resolve this situation.

University clones cow, could benefit industry

MONTPELIER, Vt. — Researchers at the University of Vermont have helped clone a cow that could be resistant to mastitis, a discovery that one day could save the dairy industry billions of dollars.

UVM researchers cloned a gene that kills the bacteria that causes certain forms of mastitis — a disease that inflames the mammary gland.

The gene was successful in staving off staphylococcal mastitis in genetically engineered mice.

"Our work has led to the world's first mastitis-resistant animals," Dr. John Bramley, UVM's lead researcher and dean of the College of Agriculture and Life Sciences, said Wednesday. "Tests show that the animals are perfectly normal, their milk supply is perfectly safe and their offspring grows well."

Mastitis costs the dairy industry $1.7 billion dollars a year in prevention, treatment and milk losses, the USDA estimates. About 30 percent of all cases are caused by staphylococcus bacteria.

But it could be a year before Annie the cow, born in March 2000, produces milk and can be tested for mastitis.

"This is totally a first. I think we're absolutely in the world lead here in that nobody has used molecular genetics to prevent disease before," Bramley said.

Groups file suit against Florida election officials

MIAMI — Civil rights groups are suing Florida election officials on behalf of thousands of blacks, saying they were denied the right to vote in the presidential election because of institutionalized racism.

The lawsuit filed Wednesday asks a federal judge to overhaul how Florida's elections are run by getting rid of punch-card ballots used in 25 counties, fixing the system for purging voter lists and monitoring state elections for 10 years.

On Thursday, a federal commission was to begin hearings in Tallahassee on voting problems in the presidential election. The panel was to hear accusations of harassment, voter registration irregularities, illegal voting-poll purges and accounts of a state patrol road block set up election morning near a precinct.

"We do not know whether discrimination existed or exists, but we're here because we have a duty to look at these allegations," said Mary Frances Berry, chairwoman of the U.S. commission on Civil Rights.

Gov. Jeb Bush, brother of the president-elect, was subpoenaed last week and scheduled to testify Thursday. The governor formed a panel last month to recommend improvements, and both houses of the Republican-controlled Legislature are examining the disputed balloting.

Secretary of State Katherine Harris, state elections chief Clay Roberts and county election supervisors are named in the suit. Roberts said he couldn't comment because he hadn't seen it.

"This thing is so massive," said Adora Obi Nwene, Florida president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. "It's scary to think about what the numbers could be."

New Chiefs head coach to be announced today

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — If Dick Vermeil had been willing to come out of retirement in 1989, Marty Schottenheimer never would have coached in Kansas City.

Carl Peterson's fondest wish has been to have his old buddy be his head coach. Now, with one of the NFL's richest coaching contracts and the blessing of the commissioner, he's finally got him.

"This is, in my opinion, the premier head football coach in the National Football League," the Chiefs' president and general manager said shortly after commissioner Paul Tagliabue decided what compensation was due Vermeil's old team, the St. Louis Rams. "He's not only a consummate football coach, but he's a great person."

natural ways of heating their homes.

Adam Wilson, junior in financial services, said he opens his blinds to his two-bedroom apartment to let the sun in during the day.

"It warms up the apartment a lot during the day because of the sun's heat," Wilson said.

Wilson said his heating bill was around $60 in December, which is common, he said.

"I am hoping it won't be higher next month, but I heard it probably will be," Wilson said. "We aren't doing anything different. We set our thermostat to 63 degrees and leave it there. Hopefully, that will help the cost."

Higher gas prices strain aid systems

By JESSICA PITTS

Kansas State Collegian

American Red Cross programs set up to help combat the increase in natural gas prices are running low due to an increased demand for assistance.

Clay Myers-Bowman, director of the Riley County chapter of American Red Cross, said he is getting nervous as more people are asking for help.

"We only have so much money to help them with," said Myers-Bowman, graduate student in journalism and mass communications. "When that money runs out, I am not sure what is going to happen."

The Riley County Red Cross sponsors two programs to help residents with their bills. The first one, called Project Deserve, is for people 60 or older or for people who receive Social Security benefits. They can apply for an amount of $200 per family to assist with their bills.

"The problem is that each family can only receive the assistance for two months each year," he said. "We also only have $8,000 for the whole year, and we are already halfway through the money, and we are only two weeks into January."

The money that supports the program comes from contributions from KPL Gas Services' customers and employees, Myers-Bowman said.

The second program is funded by the city of Manhattan, and there are no specific guidelines for receiving aid. Myers-Bowman said the amount of help is based on the need of the family.

"We are running short on that money, too," he said. "We only receive $16,000 a year to distribute, which doesn't go far with prices like this."

Kansas has a law that prevents electricity from being shut off during peak winter months, but Myers-Bowman said he is concerned about what will happen when that period is over.

"When April or March comes around and people are still behind on bills, I think a lot will have no choice but to have their electricity or gas shut off," he said. "They simply can't afford it."

Myers-Bowman said KPL is working with the American Red Cross to implement a program that will give 7,500 low-income customers a 50-percent discount on their gas bills through June.

"The problem there is that 7,500 will not go a long way, but it is a starting point," he said.

KAREN MIKOLS/Collegian

Jake Clasen, junior in wildlife biology, stands outside of a window he and his roommates covered in plastic at 1224 Bluemont Ave. They made several adjustments to their house because they said a lot of heat was seeping through the windows. Clasen said he has noticed a difference since the addition of plastic.

Those who want the discount will have to apply for it through the Topeka American Red Cross office at (785) 234-0568. However, Myers-Bowman said the list is filling up quickly.

"My advice is to call them to get your name on the waiting list as soon as possible," he said. "But people must understand that the assistance will not happen right away because they can only accept so many people."

Guidelines have not yet been set for who can receive the money because the Red Cross just accepted the money last week. The application for those who qualify should be available next week.

"They are working extremely fast to get that program in place," he said. "There are a lot of people who need assistance, and we can only take it one at a time."

K-State agricultural funds for research decided by need

By KRISTEN DYMACEK
Kansas State Collegian

Agricultural research at K-State does not favor large farm corporations that donate money to the university, said Marc Johnson, dean of the College of Agriculture.

Even though there are some farmers and ranchers who believe the large corporations are favored, Johnson said the money the college receives from grants and donations is divided for research based on need.

In an Associated Press story last week, two state representatives said they would like to see a better checks and balances system that would monitor the research projects. But Johnson said that already is taken care of at K-State.

"We have a lot of checks and balances here," he said.

The College of Agriculture received $17 million in grants and contracts for research in 1999. He said of the money the college receives, only five to seven percent of the grants are from large corporations.

He said what areas the research money goes to is decided by a five-year research and extension plan in which there are several steps, including asking farmers about key issues and studying national, state and faculty priorities.

"As far as agenda is concerned, we make it a real point to serve everybody who walks in the door," Johnson said. "We work with everybody, small and big."

He said the research covers a variety of areas, including everything from food safety and water quality to genetics and new strains of feed and crops.

Roger McEowen, associate professor of agricultural economics, said he understood how smaller family farmers could have concerns, but they were unfounded at K-State.

"Certainly, any time there are private grants or donations from corporations, those groups do apply some pressure," McEowen said. "And there is an indication that there are problems at other colleges and universities, but that's not a legitimate concern at K-State."

In the same Associated Press story, McEowen was quoted as saying research results favor the corporations that donate the money. But he said he was misquoted and that is not the case at K-State.

"The administrators here do a tremendous job of maintaining academic integrity," he said.

Smaller farmers also have voiced concern because of a severe economic problem they have experienced, McEowen said.

"They are seeing record profits at corporate levels, the ADMs, the Cargills, the Tysons," he said. "But at the same time, the smaller farms are experiencing economic depression."

Johnson said another possible concern could have been the recent million-dollar donations from Cargill and ADM for a new agricultural center.

"It was explicitly stated in the Cargill and ADM contracts that the money was to help build a new grain science complex to train our students so they could hire them," he said.

Because K-State is one of the top five universities supplying employees to Cargill, Johnson said large corporations often have a particular interest in K-State students.

Lori Fink, owner of Fink Beef Genetics in Manhattan, said she appreciates the help from the larger corporations.

"I'm very thankful they are in a position to supply funds," Fink said. "We all can't give large amounts of money, and I don't believe that K-State can keep up with changes without the larger corporations and their dollars."

McEowen said those dollars enable everyone to see results.

"In terms of the research being done here at K-State, it benefits its producer, regardless of size," he said.

Monday holiday should be day on, not day off

Most students consider the upcoming Martin Luther King Jr. Day on Monday to be a day off from school. Yet it should not be considered a day off; it should be considered a day on.

A day on in terms of opportunities for students, faculty and members of the community to participate in a variety of activities.

The theme for Monday's activities is "A Day On, Not a Day Off." This is a chance for students, faculty, staff and members of the community to spend the day volunteering. To find out more about this community service act, call 532-5701 or e-mail ksuserve@ksu.edu.

Volunteers will have the opportunity to help at the Wonder Workshop Children's Museum, the Salvation Army Thrift Store, Meadowlark Hills Retirement Community, Manhattan Housing Authority, Homecare and Hospice, Special Olympics, Sunset Zoological Park, Homestead Assisted Living and St. Joseph Senior Community.

Activities starting at 10 a.m. at Manhattan Town Center include a fashion show and a talent show final. At noon the mall will be host to a public awards ceremony.

There are activities here at K-State as well. At 6 p.m. in All Faiths Chapel there will be a candlelight vigil, followed by a memorial walk at 6:30.

However, activities are not limited to Monday. There is an observance week, Jan. 13-20. Some of the opportunities to become involved during this time include a one-person theatrical performance and a dialogue that addresses domestic violence.

Thursday night's keynote lecturer is Farai Chideya, an author and journalist. Her lecture is titled "The Color of Our Future," and it will be presented at 10:30 a.m. in McCain Auditorium.

This is an excellent opportunity for students to participate not only by volunteering, but also by becoming more informed about one of the greatest American leaders.

The Collegian's Campus Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on topics relevant to the publication.

Hey, Carmike Theaters, thanks for bringing "Traffic" to Manhattan. Just kidding. Maybe I'll have to drive to Topeka to actually see a movie worthy of awards, unlike here in Manhattan, which only wants to show commercial successes.

Who cares about your new Fourum ideas? Just print what we call in about. Don't cheat us out of another Fourum.

OK, I have a question about my schedule. What the hell does W mean? And why won't anyone tell me?

Last time I checked, Reed Dunn was not the editor of the newspaper anymore. As a matter of fact, I believe he graduated. So, other than to amuse me, why is his voice still on the Campus Fourum thing?

Let me take this time to save all the troubles of students with their small talk this week. It goes like this:

"Hi! How are you doing?"

"Hey, I'm fine"

"Did you have a good break?"

"Yeah, it was cool"

"OK, bye."

The "On The Topic" question is: What do you think of morality based television shows?

Death by dining out

Meals at restaurant with family can cost more than expected

The scariest nightmare for any college student is going home and finding the cabinets and refrigerator full of the same food that was there when they left for summer break. My parents have given up on the idea of cooking or having food in their house.

Rather than dealing with the hassle of cooking, my family has become dining-out junkies. With a mental list of about 20 frequented restaurants, it is a nightly ritual to figure out which lucky place the Bertuglia family will patronize that night. With our cell phones and watches synchronized, we plan to meet at the designated restaurant by 6 p.m.

Dad always arrives first. My brother and I usually arrive at the same time, and my mother staggers in last. Between the arrival of each member there is always much antagonizing of the poor hostess. Between not knowing how to pronounce our last name and the sheer annoyance of my father or brother asking every five minutes where our name is on the list, she usually gives up and seats us before our designated time is up.

Eventually, some poor server who was given our table approaches the table with an apprehensive look on their face. Given the fact my parents frequent the same restaurants in a cycle, it almost is a given they have heard horror stories about my family. I always recognize the pleading look in the eye saying, "No, no, not the Bertuglia family again."

It is evident as the servers pass out the beverage napkins they are contemplating whether they should go through the pain of serving my family or run screaming the other way. As they ask for our drink order, my parents and I usually order some kind of alcoholic drink, and my brother puts his hands over his eyes, looks down and mutters he wants a Dr Pepper. It is a good night if my dad doesn't bark our drink orders at the server and my mom treats them like humans.

When it is time to order our food, the server usually has begun a twitching of some sort. It is amazing; my father always orders the same thing at every restaurant he visits. The kicker is, he never can remember what it is called or what it comes with. He is a negotiator at heart. The negotiations games begin. The phrase "Can I trade the French fries for coleslaw?" still sticks in my head.

My favorite part of the family dining experience is when it is time to pay the bill. This is the part of the evening that makes me want to slump so low in the booth that I somehow can slide down to the floor and scurry out of the restaurant. As soon as my father is ready to pay, everyone in the restaurant knows. Tact is not his strong point. My brother and I liken his method of getting a check delivered to that of an air-traffic controller bringing in a plane. He sits in his seat, waving his hands over his head, desperately trying to make sure the server knows we are ready to pay the bill.

These are just a few of the highlights of my family dining experience. Sometimes I know as we walk into an eating establishment that we leave the same scars as a table full of 5-year-old children set loose with crackers and chocolate sauce. We are an abhorrence.

For the longest time, people in restaurants were called "waitresses" and "waiters." Now, the politically correct term for them is "servers." These servers generally get paid $2 an hour, and the rest comes from tips. They usually are students just hoping to make enough money to pay rent, bills or tuition. Everyone knows people like my family, the ones who make the poor server work for every cent of their tip. Servers are regular people trying to make ends meet. They don't deserve to be talked to rudely or barked at because they could not satisfy your every whim. It often is said in the restaurant business that everyone should be required to work one day in a restaurant to understand the sheer hell of it. The term "server" should not be synonymous with "slave."

After much post-winter break reflection, I think the next time I go home I might take a chance on the leftover holiday dinner still sitting in the refrigerator rather than terrorize some poor server with the likes of my family.

Critical thinking at ebb for gullible public

Media-fed controversies, sensationalism prove lack of opinion formation on behalf of individuals in today's superficial society

As children, many of us were taught the valuable lessons of the boy who cried wolf, and of Chicken Little, who swore the sky was falling. We also were warned to keep our eyes out for a wolf in sheep's clothing and that we couldn't necessarily believe everything we read, much less saw or heard. Despite everything we learned while growing up, nothing compares to the day we realized there literally is a sucker born every minute.

Now that it officially is the new millennium and the world is still spinning on its axis, it's time to address the idiocy of gullibility that is plaguing the human race.

Gullibility and temporary stupidity is something everyone is guilty of from time to time, however; with every passing generation, its presence in society sadly becomes more and more obvious. The problem is that the majority are so gullible, or simply blind to the world around them, they don't realize a handful of their peers are exploiting their weakness and turning a human flaw into a multi-million dollar industry. How else do you rationalize those people like my grandfather, who are willing to pay more than 25 cents for a special-edition Virginia quarter? What about that mad-cow rush to get your own Tickle Me Elmo? Undoubtedly, the sales and marketing industries have realized the fortune that can be made simply by preying on the gullible. After all, if someone is willing to buy it, why not sell it, right?

Although politicians and religious cults are guilty of preying upon the gullible and slight of mind, neither can compare to the worldwide mass media that have turned the exploitation of a tiny flaw into an art form. The media frequently sensationalize the mundane and hype the trivial for nothing more than better ratings and increased sales. Why else would anyone turn an everyday espousal murder trial into the "Trial of the Century"? Or transform a simple deportation into a Supreme Court matter?

The media love to make mountains out of mole hills. No one else but the media — and those looking to make a quick buck — ever would have thought to transform a possible computer bug into an apocalyptic frenzy.

Oddly enough, the public response to the massive media blitz was strangely reminiscent to the 1938 radio broadcast of "War of the Worlds" by H.G. Wells. So instead of long lines at the computer store, there were lines that rivaled the premiere of "Star Wars: Episode One" at every supermarket and religious institution worldwide.

By the way, wasn't there some kind of election or something a month or so ago?

Despite having the ethics of a pimp, at the end of the day journalists merely are providing their audiences with what they want: something more exciting than their trivial existence.

Sadly, people relish in the hype of public figure caught with their pants down and the sensationalization of the latest conspiracy theory. It's certainly not the fault of the journalist if people blindly take what they have produced as the gospel. Rather, it is their audience's fault for not being competent enough to formulate their own opinions.

Instead of stealing the opinions and ideas from others — much like Bill Gates has done — it's time for people to cut the cord and produce their own original opinions. After all, we're not just someone's pet parrot.

Increase of education budget focus for state Legislature

By NICK BRATKOVIC
Kansas State Collegian

Funding elementary and secondary education is a priority on the Kansas Legislature's agenda as a new session begins.

Gov. Bill Graves' State of the State Address on Monday night praised what the state has done for education but challenged it to do better.

"K-12 education is the most important issue that will challenge us this session," Graves said in his speech.

Graves recommended an increase of $50 in base state aid per student be added to match the increase of each of the last two years, and he proposed $68.4 million in new money for elementary and secondary education.

It is an issue Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, and Rep. Jeff Peterson, R-Manhattan, said is a high priority.

The key issue, Peterson said, is looking at ways to maximize resources.

"We want to look at creating new money for K-12 schools from existing resources," he said. "I think we have a couple of options."

Peterson said an increase in taxes is one possible option, but he said there were other ideas the Legislature should consider.

"I think a district boundary study and a change in formula needs to happen," he said.

The issue, Oleen said, affects districts of varying sizes and schools throughout the state.

"The issue affects every school district as two-thirds of the state's schools are seeing declining enrollment," Oleen said.

Declining enrollment affects the amount of districts' budgets due to state funding and the quality of education a student receives.

"We want our schools to be the right size so that everyone can learn," Oleen said.

Peterson said he agreed, but said solving the problems plaguing higher education will not happen immediately.

"It takes longer than one year to move from point A to point B," he said.

He said it is a situation similar to what was done with the state's higher education, as changes with the Board of Regents and funding aspects have taken more time to materialize. In the case of funding, the state added $21 million last year, and Graves recommended adding another $21 million this legislative session.

Another issue Oleen said needs attention is the state's lottery — a lottery Graves said should be renewed, pointing out the amount of revenue it gives the state. Graves said the lottery generates around $60 million a year.

Oleen said she hoped the legislature would decide on the lottery early in the session.

"I think we need to decide on this issue early in the Legislature," Oleen said, "because if we don't, then we need to figure out how to cut $60 million from the state's budget."

"I would hope that we would renew it early in the Legislature and then go back and make changes to the system through a separate bill."

Study suggests local schools reorganize into smaller districts

By LUCAS SHIVERS
Kansas State Collegian

Some Manhattan and area school districts might be forced to restructure or consolidate in the future, a study announced Wednesday.

Presented to a joint meeting of state legislative members and State Board of Education members, the Comprehensive Study of Organization of Kansas School Districts raised questions and concerns.

"I was disappointed with the components of the study," said

Marcia Bone, associate superintendent for site support of Manhattan/Ogden USD 383. "It comes at a time of crisis in Kansas education."

The crisis is due to lack of funding, and with the declining enrollment, the study looks to mergers as a solution. The study suggested reorganizing the state's 304 school districts to around 255. The report identified districts in need of attention based on low performance and high spending.

USD 383 was found to be too large to be served by a single high school. Enrollment at Manhattan High School's West Campus is around 1,400, and the east campus has around 450 students.

"Our district probably is too big," Bone said. "But the study will impact us beyond splitting numbers."

The study, she said, would affect the entire community.

Legislative action might be on the horizon; however, no decisions are scheduled until later in the 2001 session.

"We don't expect to see anything until at least May," Bone said. "We would like to see education issues passed earlier in the session. It is hard to plan for next year with decisions made so close to the beginning of the new school year."

The full text of the study was not available from the research firm, said Tamera Milligan, an executive secretary for the Kansas Education Commission, Augenhlick & Myers Inc., a Denver-based consulting firm facilitated the 15-month study.

Funded by a 1999 proposal from the Kansas Legislature, the study was designed to provide guidance in dealing with declining enrollment and fewer funding dollars, Milligan said.

Sylvester Benson, Manhattan High School principal, did not comment on the study or to any possible effects it will have to his school.

The last round of forced consolidations came in 1964, Bone said.

"District mergers are a political and emotional issue," she said. "Even decades of years later, the decision still brings a heartfelt reaction from communities."

Bone said her foremost concern was that the study is taking the focus off other education priorities like attracting qualified staff, funding for special education and the technology infrastructure.

"This is a major distraction from the real issues of public education," she said. "It takes attention away from addressing adequate funding issues and other high need areas."

Consolidations should be looked at in a more long-term perspective, Bone said. There are additional issues that need to be re-examined.

"It may be part of the solution, but there are more pressing issues at hand," she said. "The kids in public education need help right now, and another year in study is another year they will suffer."

RECLAIMING OFFENSE

Cats to face Baylor in conference home opener

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

After falling on the road to No. 23 Texas on Wednesday night, K-State will look to bounce back in Saturday's conference home opener against Baylor.

But they'll need an offense to do that—one of the missing elements in the Cats' loss to the Longhorns in Austin, Wooldridge said.

"Offensively, we were just inept the whole night, that's all you can say. We had no rhythm. We had no thrust," he said. "And probably most disappointing was that we just did not have a person step up and make a statement on that end of the floor."

"We could not find that guy, and for us to be effective, someone has to step up and have a game."

So far this season, that guy usually has been transfer Phineas (Tony) Atchison. However, the Texas contest was the junior's first game back from an injury, despite still leading the Cats with 11 points.

Regardless, Wooldridge knows his team will need Atchison to elevate his game against Baylor's zone defense.

"Tony is a player that believes he can make shots, and we need a guy that's a shot maker right now—desperately," Wooldridge said. "And having Tony available is hopefully a shot in the arm as we prepare for Baylor on Saturday night."

Besides, K-State can't shoot much worse than it did against the Horns, Wooldridge said, as the Cats connected on just 14-of-46 field goal attempts.

"You hope that we'll play with a little more confidence than we did last night," Wooldridge said Thursday, "and if we do, then the shots will fall a little bit better. But I don't think we'll ever be a great shooting team—we don't have that kind of arsenal behind us on the offensive end."

That's why it's so important for K-State to take care of the things it can take care of, Wooldridge said.

Kelvin Howell hauls in a rebound during K-State's win over Tennessee State earlier in the season. The Cats take on Baylor on Saturday night in Bramlage Coliseum.

"Our effort has got to be great every night, our defense has got to be great, we've got to rebound the ball, and we can't turn the ball over 21 times and beat anybody in this league," he said. "So those are things that you think as a coach that we've got to get better at."

Plus, with Baylor's 12-1 record, the Cats might need to get better in a hurry.

"From what I know about them,"

Wooldridge said, "I think they have a chance to be a very competitive team in the league. I know they were picked ahead of us and I know that they've won 12 games, so we're going to have to play very, very well to beat them. But we have to play that way to beat anyone in our league."

However, the Bears only return two starters and six lettermen from a team that finished tied for 8th in the Big 12 last season after posting a 14-15 overall record.

Nevertheless, Baylor is off to a good start in 2000-01, with four different players averaging double figures.

Cat forward Travis Reynolds isn't oblivious to the Bears, though, or their style of play. After all, this is his third year in the league.

"From playing them for two years, they're more of a perimeter team," he said. "I think they'll try to come in and zone us and try to shoot the ball on the perimeter, but I think we'll be ready for them."

That is, as long as K-State forgets about its struggles against Texas on Wednesday, Reynolds said.

"We got beat last night and we've got to put it behind us and get ready for Saturday," he said Thursday, "but it's going to be good to get back at home and play in front of our own fans."

Team finishes with Sweet 16 berth

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

Since the K-State volleyball team never had advanced beyond the second round of the NCAA tournament, simply taking the floor against Wisconsin in the Sweet 16 should have been quite an honor.

Never satisfied, however, the Cats believed they could defeat first-seeded Wisconsin and play their way into the championship match, head coach Jim McLaughlin said.

So when K-State did exit the tournament following a 3-1 loss to Wisconsin, the feeling was one of shock and disappointment, instead of satisfaction.

"The team was stunned. They were hurt, and the look in their eyes was, 'We should have won that thing. We could have won it,'" McLaughlin said. "It's going to take some time for this thing to wear off, but in time I think the team will look back and be pretty proud of what they did. They gave it everything they had."

After losing the first game 3-15, K-State fell behind 10-0 in the second game but fought back to tie it up at 12-12 before eventually winning 16-14. Wisconsin would win a hard-fought third game 15-10, though, and took the momentum for good, defeating K-State 15-6 in the fourth and final game. Wisconsin then would continue on to the title match, where it lost to Big 12 conference winner Nebraska in five games.

Despite knowing they lost to a beatable team, the experience was a good one for the Cats.

"I don't think we probably played as well as we hoped to, but it was a great situation to be put in and a great environment to play in," junior outside hitter Liz Wegner said. "It just shows how far we've come."

Indeed, the Cats' final ranking of No. 16 was the highest in school history, and their 22-9 record also marked the best record during McLaughlin's five-year tenure at K-State.

Even more encouraging for the Cats is that the future appears to have even greater potential. The Cats will return eight of 10 letter winners and five of the six starters for the 2001 season, including all-league selections Liz Wegner and Disney Bronnenberg. Wegner also was selected to the All-Central Region team, along with senior middle blocker Kelle Branting.

Unfortunately for K-State, Branting, who set the school record for kills by a middle blocker, is the one starter being lost to graduation. The Cats also will lose senior defensive specialist Julie Thomas.

"We will definitely miss Kelle and her leadership," Wegner said. "She played all four years."

"She has so much experience, and she added a lot to the team, but she also taught us all a lot. Julie Thomas did some great things for us on defense and showed a lot of heart. She just made us better in practice every day by digging all the balls."

Picking up the slack for the two exiting players are the current freshmen, two of which, outside hitter Cari Jensen and middle

Coaching, fundamentals keys to basketball team's victories over winter break

Either the holidays were quite kind to the K-State men's basketball team, or Jim Wooldridge's boys sure looked to be in the spirit of the season.

Whatever the case might be, the winter break version of the Wildcats looked far better than their last place Big 12 pre-season ranking would indicate.

In fact, they went out and literally surprised the heck out of a lot of people. Here's the rundown:

As the fall 2000 semester came to a close, K-State had notched an uneventful, less-than-stellar record of 2-4, dropping games to the likes of Wichita State and Old Dominion. Simply put: not the Cats' best basketball.

But during the break, Wooldridge's squad found new life, winning five out of its seven games to improve to a winning 7-6 mark. And don't think the two losses were'n respectable, either, as the Cats ran into a tough Memphis squad on the road and a 23rd-ranked Texas team in Austin.

Granted, victories over East Washington, Hampton and Texas-Pan American during that stretch might be a little ho-hum (OK, more than a little), but needless to say, K-State's other two wins did a little more than raise a few eyebrows.

On Dec. 23, the Cats' pre-Christmas wish of sorts was granted as K-State did something it hadn't in 13 seasons: defeat a ranked non-conference team. Even I had to check the stat sheet a couple times.

The Cats, thanks to a 31-point barrage by guard Larry Reid, toppled then-No. 19 Iowa 86-78 in front of 7,198-strong at Bramlage Coliseum.

Reid was simply masterful, tallying the most points by a Wildcat in over five seasons, back to the good ol' days of Elliot Hatcher and "Ski" Jones. It was just one of those nights that everything seemed to fall for the point guard.

His efforts even nabbed him Big 12 Rookie of the Week honors, which isn't a bad confidence boost for a transfer looking to find his niche in the Cats' offensive rhythm.

Then, three short games later, Wooldridge's players answered the call once more, this time winning a league game on the road—and no, that's not a typo, either.

K-State handed Texas A&M a 53-48 loss in College Station to win its first conference road opener since 1996, keeping the Aggies to 30 percent shooting from the field.

Now ask me to explain the Cats' sudden turnaround over the holiday break—I can't.

It's one of those phenomena that only Dick Vitale- or Keith Jackson-type sports commentators would have the guts (or sheer stupidity) to try and decipher.

My guess? It all lies in the coaching. Anybody who starts from scratch with a new program simply needs time to settle in. Now that Wooldridge has had a chance to do that, maybe the wins will follow. So far, so good as of late, but let's not hold our breath for too long. Remember, K-State has a long and grueling Big 12 schedule ahead.

No time for rest. No time for regrouping, revamping or anything like that. The transition phase is now over. Now it's the big time. Now the games are as critical as ever.

The Big 12 season is upon us, my friends, and whether Wooldridge's boys rise to the occasion, well, let's just sit back and watch for ourselves.

I can only tell you this much: K-State is a team bubbling with potential. No, everything doesn't always turn out as expected. They realize that. Of course you're going to have an off-night here and there (i.e. offensively against Texas on Wednesday night). They understand that.

Yet the bottom line is that the Cats have the basic fundamentals and the kind of coaching staff they need to be successful.

Now, let's just hope they're not running on a five-year plan.

Cats to battle KU with worst conference start since 1993

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

After dropping their first three Big 12 games of the season, the K-State women's basketball team is facing its worst league start since 1993.

Even worse, the schedule is not going to make getting that first win any easier, as K-State (10-4, 0-3) will face Kansas (6-7, 0-2) at 3 p.m. Saturday in Lawrence. Despite the Jayhawks' similarly dismal conference record, they still have a mental edge over K-State, which has beaten KU only twice in the past four years.

"They have played extremely well against us the last three years," head coach Deb Patterson said. "They've had our number. They're going to bring a high-level of confidence against our ball club."

Kansas also will bring an offensive weapon that will provide a tough challenge for K-State's most inexperienced area. Jaclyn Johnson, the Jayhawks' 6-foot, 1-inch senior forward, has made a living this season banging and bruising away in the paint.

"Jaclyn Johnson has assumed a primary scoring role," Patterson said. "She is very physical down low and rebounds the ball extremely well - a very tough, blue-collar worker."

Johnson will match up with K-State's freshmen forwards Nicole Ohlde and Andrea Armstrong, who still are learning to play with the bigger, stronger players found in the Big 12. In the Cats' previous game, Nebraska's large, physical center Casey Leonhardt at times was able to push around the K-State post players.

"You just can't turn around and shoot it because you'll get it blocked," Ohlde said. "We definitely learned that. I've also got to start the offense down lower and keep working and get my position where I want it to be."

Patterson said she agreed that her post players learned some tough lessons at Nebraska.

"Andrea Armstrong went one for eight. She learned a great deal about playing against a bigger post player," she said. "Her shot selection and her composure were not at the level they needed to be to succeed."

While a matchup with Johnson will not provide an easy learning environment, there is no gain without pain, so to speak.

"These are lessons we're only going to learn as we play," Patterson said. "And, at some point in time, I'm just hopeful we can convert these lessons into success and into finishing with a victory."

One advantage that Armstrong, and especially Ohlde, have against bigger players, like Johnson, is their quickness, a trait that the two must take advantage of Saturday, Ohlde said.

"I don't think they're as quick as some that we've played. You have to be quicker on offense and make it harder for them to find you," she said.

Notching a win against Kansas will be made even more difficult with the Jayhawks' poor start, which will provide them with ample motivation to beat the Wildcats.

"They're 0-2, and we're going to get them at home," Patterson said. "They're another team that's going to look at this as if it's a must-win."

Defeating Kansas is not an impossible task, however. The Cats just need to play like they know they are capable, Ohlde said.

"We know what we have to do. We just have to go out and do it," she said.

Basketball team adopts, donates to local charitable organization

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

Jim Wooldridge's arrival to K-State was not solely basketball related.

To prove it, the Cats' coach and the entire men's basketball program adopted the Boys & Girls Club of Manhattan as a way to reach out to the community.

On Thursday afternoon at Bramlage Coliseum, Wooldridge formally presented Barb Allen, executive director of the Boys & Girls Club, with a check of $900.44, proceeds that were raised at K-State's Dec. 17 basketball clinic at Ahearn Field House.

More than 250 boys participated in the clinic, run by Cat coaches and players to teach kids about the basic fundamentals of basketball. Each participant paid a $10 entrance fee and received a T-shirt, as well as two tickets to K-State's

Jan. 2 contest with Texas-Pan American, a game in which the Cats triumphed 69-68.

Wooldridge said he was honored to help such a charitable organization.

"Our basketball program, over the years, has flourished because of people supporting it, and I think we're all obligated to give back in whatever way we can to the community and people that help make up this university and the athletic program," Wooldridge said. "So that's what it's about, finding ways to help other people."

"And I think it's a great lesson for our players, that they know they're doing something for someone else. It's not all about them, it's not all about us - it's about other people, and that's why we did it. That's why we want to do it."

Sophomore forward Quentin Buchanan said he certainly got that message.

"It's good to connect with the community because they get involved with K-State and it brings more fans to the games," he said. "Plus, they feel more comfortable with you, and they can speak to you when they see you out in public, too."

All in all, Allen, on behalf of the Boys & Girls Club, said the organization received more than just a monetary benefit from Wooldridge and his players.

"One of our core areas at the Boys & Girls Club is health and life skills, and another one is sports, fitness and recreation," she said. "So, the things that they're doing is really beneficial for our kids because it helps them realize that it's really cool to be fit."

"And they really enjoyed the fact that the players take an interest in them—it gives them something to look up to—and it's really a good experience for us."

Track team to kick off with KSU Invitational

By LAURA BOYD
Kansas State Collegian

K-State track and field will compete in its first meet following winter break this weekend with the KSU Invitational at Ahearn Field House.

The Cats enter the meet after a strong start to the team's season at the KSU Allcomer's meet in December, an indicator that the future looks bright for this season, head coach Cliff Rovelto said.

"The team is very complete," he said. "We have some very high-quality athletes. This team is one of the best teams in the country."

The KSU Invitational will be host to women's teams from Nebraska, Wyoming, Emporia State, Oklahoma State and Nebraska-Omaha at the meet. On the men's side, K-State will welcome Nebraska, Wyoming and Emporia State to Manhattan.

Rovelto said he prides his team on its ability to perform well across the board. While many teams do not participate in all events, K-State has the strength to do it all, despite being capped on the number of scholarships it can offer. In track and field it, is more difficult to recruit enough athletes since the NCAA allows 18 scholarships for women and only 12.5 scholarships for men, Rovelto said.

This weekend's meet begins Friday with women's field events at 4 p.m. The women close the day with running events beginning at 6:30 p.m., when middle-distance runner Amy Mortimer will have the chance to follow up on her cross country success. The sophomore was named the Midwest Region's female runner of the year prior to the NCAA Cross Country Championships last fall.

The men will follow Saturday with field events beginning at noon and running events at 2:30 p.m.

The KSU Invitational is just the first of a busy schedule the Cats face, with a meet every week until the Big 12 Indoor Championships in February.

blocker Lauren Goehring, started throughout the second half of the season and the NCAA Tournament.

"The freshmen were awesome," Bronnenberg said. "I'm just so proud of them. They handled the pressures of the tournament really well, especially when you consider the fact that they've just never been in any kind of experience like that before."

"I think Cari came out huge in the first and second round, and Lauren played the best game I've ever seen her play against Wisconsin. She played really well, especially opposite Sherisa Livingston, who people really talked about a lot," Bronnenberg said. "She had her head in the water a lot of times across the net, which just shows how she's matured so quickly over the last four months."

While the freshman will be depended on to continue improving, even more will be expected of Wegner and Bronnenberg, both of whom have the potential to be considered for All-American honors. The entire team, though, should benefit from the experience gained by the team by reaching the Sweet 16.

"I think more than anything, getting there made us understand that we're pretty close to getting to the round of eight," McLaughlin said. "We went from sixth to fifth to fourth to tied for second in the Big 12. Someday, the ultimate goal is to win the Big 12, and I think if you do that then you have a shot to win the national title."

Dress designer receives international 1st-place award

By COLLEEN FOOTE
Kansas State Collegian

It is colorful. It is full of life. It contains unique meanings. It is art. It is a masterpiece. It is a dress.

The creator of this dress, Kyeong-Sook Cho, graduate student in apparel design, not only designs clothes — she makes award-winning masterpieces.

Last November, Cho's dress, "Dragon Flies Toward The 21st Century," won first place in the evening-wear category in the Fashion Group International 2000 worldwide college student fashion design competition in New York City. She won second place against the 16 other category winners and was awarded a $2,500 scholarship.

About 100 students submitted designs in the competition. Cho also won second place for her design board, which illustrates her design sequence and selection of colors, fabrics, textures, specifications and fabrication steps.

Cho, who has won previous Fashion Group International Awards, found out about the competition on the Internet. She began working on her dress in winter 1999 and finished last June. Throughout the making of her dress, Cho never aimed to win awards.

"I want to feel that I did my best in whatever I do," said Cho, who is called "Esther" by her American friends. "I think that is what made me win competitions in the past and not because of the uniqueness of the designs."

The dress features an image of a colorful dragon, which has special meaning for Cho.

"The year 2000 was the year of the dragon in Asia," said Cho, a native of South Korea. "The dragon is an inspirational source that means good times will come."

Finding pictures of dragons to help design her dress was a difficult task in the United States, Cho said. Her younger brother helped her find the perfect dragon by sending her a picture from South Korea, where pictures of dragons are easy to find.

The dress, a form-fitting, sleeveless evening gown is made of polyester, and the colorful scales of the dragon are made of brocade. The dress comprises a total of 24 pieces. Each piece is arranged asymmetrically and attached by top stitching along the scallop edges.

The dress, Cho said, satisfies target consumers pursuing independent professional lifestyles with expressive, aesthetic and functional features.

"It is a product which is pleasurable to wear as well as pleasurable to see," Cho said. She said she owes her accomplishments to the encouragement of her professors in the Department of Apparel Design and her co-workers at the International Student Center.

Gwendolyn O'Neal, head of the Department of Apparel Textiles and Interior Design, said the dress is an example of good engineering in addition to an example of wonderful design.

"Beyond a doubt, she is very skillful both technically and artistically," O'Neal said.

Cho came to the apparel design program after a professor in South Korea recommended K-State to her. Since winning numerous awards in apparel design, Cho has helped K-State's apparel design program become nationally recognized.

"By Esther winning this award, it says something of the quality of the faculty and students we have at K-State," said Carol Kellett, dean of the College of Human Ecology.

Cho is self-motivated and creative when it comes to creating design ideas, said Janice Huck, professor in apparel design and Cho's academic adviser.

"She is excellent in her craftsmanship," Huck said. "She competed with students from some of the top design schools in the nation and did wonderful."

Her family lives in South Korea and has only seen her award-winning dress in pictures she sent to them. Cho, who hopes to enter another design to the competition, said her family is very proud of her apparel design accomplishments.

"In the future, I hope to have a career in the United States with the apparel design industry," Cho said. "I eventually want to teach apparel design."

The Department of Apparel Design is extremely proud of Cho's accomplishments and hopes her design accomplishments continue in the future, Huck said. "Dragon Flies Toward the 21st Century" is on display on the second floor in Justin Hall.

"The dress is awesome," Huck said. "She's a real feather in our cap."

Professor makes return as official Iditarod veterinarian

By APRIL MIDDLETON
Kansas State Collegian

Derek Mosier is prepared to head to what he calls a truly different environment to perform his voluntary duties as a veterinarian in Alaska.

For the fifth year in a row, Mosier, professor of diagnostic medicine and pathology in K-State's College of Veterinary Medicine, will head to Alaska in March as an official veterinarian for the 29th annual Iditarod. The Iditarod is a 1,049-mile dog sled competition that commemorates a 1,925-sled relay race to bring 300,000 units of serum to Nome to fight the effects of a winter diphtheria epidemic.

Mosier was introduced to the work by a former co-worker who was involved in the annual run; he's been back ever since.

Randy Basaraba, associate professor in the Department of Pathology at Colorado State University, worked as a professor at K-State for almost eight years before going to Colorado a year ago. Basaraba has served as a veterinarian for the Iditarod for six years. He said another volunteer was needed to share the yearly responsibilities, and Mosier was a perfect candidate.

"This is a significant yearly responsibility," Basaraba said. "When another person was needed to share the commitment, Derek was an obvious choice because of his capabilities and adventurous spirit."

Mosier will be one of about 35 veterinarians camped at 25 checkpoints between Anchorage and Nome.

The vets are housed in tents along the route. Mosier said their accommodations depend on what is available.

Basaraba said everyone who participates in the annual run must be open to some adventure.

"It's definitely a lot of work," Basaraba said. "You keep unusual hours and are sometimes up all night. It's rigorous, but definitely a great opportunity."

Mosier said being on hand to care for about 1,500 dogs is a change of pace.

"The experience is one that is much different than what I do here on campus," Mosier said. "I get to meet new people and experience something completely different."

The Iditarod and other dog sled competitions are different than other events because much more emphasis is placed on the animals.

"It's a joint effort between the musher and the dog team," Mosier said. "Both have to be prepared for their role or they won't do well. I've seen it happen before."

Although roughing it and braving the hardships of Alaska to serve as a volunteer isn't what Mosier calls a vacation, the experience and people keep him going back.

"It's interesting the variety of people you run into and their reasons for being there," he said. "You get to meet some of the other vets that are there each year, so when you go back it's like a homecoming of sorts."

M.M. Chengappa, head of diagnostic medicine and pathology, said Mosier is participating in a wonderful opportunity — and he is perfect to fulfill the duties.

"I fully support Derek's efforts in the Iditarod event," Chengappa said. "He's always willing to take on new challenges. His work in the Iditarod is only one example."

Thought-provoking art

Manhattan Arts Center shows display of palindromic group

Whale mating calls contribute to the ambience created by the TV screens, bronze sculptures, chromosome models and blacked-out faces of prisoners, which all are part of the latest exhibit at the Manhattan Arts Center from the artist group IMINIMI.

Four artists, using different mediums with different styles and attitudes, make up the group known as IMINIMI. The name of the group actually is two Italian words that, together, form a palindrome (a word that is the same both forwards and backwards), that literally translates to "the leasts."

The Denver-based group, which was formed in 1998, is featured at the arts center in the show, "Open Secret."

Tish Rogers, executive director of the arts center, said the unique styles of the artists come together to form an exhibit that challenges conventional ways of looking at the world.

"This exhibit is not something you can tell someone about so they'll understand what is here," she said. "They have to come and see it for themselves. It makes you think and it makes you feel something."

Whether that feeling is bad or good doesn't matter as much as whether the people who see the work feel something, Bug, IMINIMI member, said. The worst possible thing for an artist is for the viewer to be indifferent toward the work and remain totally unmoved one way or the other, Bug said. Even if someone doesn't like the exhibit, he said he hopes it makes them think.

Rick Visser, another member of IMINIMI, said he also hopes people come away from the exhibit with something to think about.

"James Bond always says, 'Shaken, not stirred,' but I want people to leave the gallery shaken and stirred," he said. "I want people to be in an unsettled and questioning mood."

One of Visser's contributions to the show is a series of pictures focused on nine inmates titled,

"Fratres: Relative Convictions." Each piece contains modified photos and artist depictions of the prisoner with things they care about written around them. Visser said he contacted each inmate personally and had a mug shot taken of each of them. Then Visser had them write down the things that mattered most to them.

"I asked each one, 'If you were dying and your possessions were being stripped away, what would be the last things that you want to keep around you?'. As I received their answers, I noticed that none of them listed material things, but instead they listed values and other intangibles," he said.

Kent Smith and Roger Rapp, also of IMINIMI, are represented in their individual work and also in the collaborative pieces which contain the work and influence of each member. Visser said the collaborative pieces are part of what makes IMINIMI unique because artists usually are too egotistical to let their artistic image be tampered with by someone else. It takes a great deal of humility to be able to let three other artists change things as they like to create a final piece as if all four artists were one, he said.

That respect between the four artists is part of the bond between them. Rogers said the artists are very diverse but still work together in a way that makes them all seem like family.

Finding three other people to connect with who help an artist in an intellectual way and support that artist's work is a rare thing, Bug said. He said he feels fortunate to have found the other members of IMINIMI and is always enthused about working with them, he said.

"I've told others before that outside of my marriage to my wife, this group is the strongest bond to people I have ever felt," he said. Bug said the work IMINIMI does is their revolution in art, and no matter what eventually happens to the group or their movement, this is where they stand.

Double-elimination style competition gives students opportunity to test knowledge, trivia

By JJ DUNCAN
Kansas State Collegian

For the game-show junkies who sit on the edge of the couch, sure they could beat Regis Philbin to the answers, win Ben Stein's cash or step all over others to be the master of "Greed," a chance to prove true prowess under pressure has arisen.

The annual College Bowl, sponsored by Union Program Council's Issues and Ideas Committee, gives students the chance to test their trivia knowledge against other students for prizes and the chance to compete on a regional and even national level. Teams of four are can sign up to compete on the third floor of the K-State Student Union until Wednesday, said Amy Wood, Issues and Ideas Committee chairwoman and coordinator of K-State's College Bowl.

"It's a fun thing for people to come out and try, and hopefully it will gain some popularity with all the quiz shows around right now," she said. "If you think you're good at trivia, there's a good chance of winning some prizes."

There will be prizes for the top-three teams, including cash prizes. The winner of the Jan. 20 event receives the opportunity to compete against other college teams, such as the University of Kansas, at the regional competition, and the winner of regionals goes on to the national competition, said Wood, junior in family studies and human services.

The tournament will be double-elimination style, with two teams competing at a time with a moderator asking the questions, Amy Pfannenstiel, graduate assistant for UPC, said. There even are precautions to make sure the teams don't share information since each team receives the same questions in each round.

"Once a team is done competing for a round, they are kept in a seclusion room," said Pfannenstiel, graduate student in student counseling/personal services.

Ben Champion, senior in chemistry, said he signed up because he enjoys trivia games and watching shows like "Win Ben Stein's Money." He said he is looking forward to the competition because he feels his team is ready to compete and it sounds like fun.

Wood said having a well-rounded and prepared team is the key to winning, and a good strategy is to find four people who each excel in different areas of knowledge.

This strategy was part of what Champion kept in mind while choosing a team, he said.

"Since we're looking for a winning team, I looked for people I knew with a good knowledge base to create a well-rounded team," he said. "We'll probably even get together for a little while before the event to discuss strategy, but for anyone who just wants to have fun, get three of your friends together and give it a shot."

Bush to name 2 Cabinet nominees today

By TOM RAUM
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President-elect George W. Bush will nominate Elaine Chao, a former Peace Corps director and the wife of a Republican senator, to become secretary of labor. GOP officials said Thursday.

Bush also was to name Robert Zoellick, who served in the state and treasury department of earlier Republican administrations, to become U.S. trade representative with Cabinet rank.

The president-elect appointed Chao two days after his first choice for the labor post withdrew to quell controversy over the disclosure that she had provided a home and financial support to an illegal immigrant who performed household chores for her in the early 1990s.

Chao is the wife of Sen. Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., and had been a prospect to return to the transportation department, where she served as deputy in the administration of former President Bush.

That nomination went to Norman Mineta, now commerce secretary, the one Democrat in the prospective Bush Cabinet.

Chao became director of the Peace Corps in 1991, headed United Way of America from 1992 until 1996, and now is a fellow at the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank.

Bush was expected to make the announcements shortly before ending a two-day visit to Washington and returning to his ranch at Crawford, Texas.

Terry Carmack, chief of staff to Rep. Anne Northup, R-Ky., confirmed Bush planned to nominate Chao.

Zoellick is a close associate of former Secretary of State James A. Baker III. When Baker was treasury secretary in the Reagan administration, Zoellick served as his executive secretary, controlling the paper flow into Baker's office. He later was undersecretary of state for economic affairs when Baker headed the State Department in the administration of Bush's father.

The trade representative, which carries the rank of ambassador, is the chief U.S. negotiator in trade talks with other nations. The post traditionally has been given Cabinet rank, a designation Bush decided to keep. Earlier, Bush aides had indicated that his former campaign manager, Commerce Secretary-designate Don Evans, would take the lead on trade issues. But trade experts argued that downgrading the representative's office could weaken the administration's hand in negotiations with other countries.

Bush's first choice for the labor post, Linda Chavez, withdrew Tuesday in the face of disclosures that she provided shelter and financial support to an illegal immigrant who performed household chores for her.

A leading candidate for the job, Eloise Anderson, former social services director in Wisconsin and California, was interviewed by Bush for the post late Wednesday after being summoned from California.

Former Rep. Jim Talent, just defeated for Missouri governor, also had been a candidate for labor secretary.

Bush also met Wednesday with Stephen Goldsmith, a former Indianapolis mayor whose name has been mentioned both for the labor post and to head the proposed White House office of faith-based programs.

That office would coordinate government assistance to religious organizations that provide social services.

The Bush team, meanwhile, defended Interior Secretary-designate Gale A. Norton against criticism of a 1996 speech on states' rights and the confederacy. In the speech, she said "we lost too much" in terms of states' rights against the federal government when the South was defeated in the Civil War.

Those comments drew fire from several environmental groups opposed to her nomination, claiming they indicated a lack of sensitivity to the horror of slavery. But Bush spokesman Ari Fleischer on Thursday called such criticism a wild distortion of what she said. Asked if Bush had changed his mind about the nominee based on the speech, he Fleischer said, "Of course not."

Earlier Thursday, Bush met with sympathetic education and business leaders, telling them he would keep to his promises of testing students for accountability and offering them transfers from lagging schools.

Bush, who made education a central campaign theme, addressed the harshest of critics: "Some folks are going to say testing is too intrusive. Other folks will say testing is racist."

"What's racist is not testing," Bush said. "What's racist really in my judgment is just to move kids through. I understand who suffers when they can't read."

Among those meeting with Bush at the educational forum were Urban League President Hugh Price, Pennsylvania Education Secretary Gene Hickock, Arizona School Superintendent Lisa Graham Keegan, Chicago public schools executive Paul Vallas and the chief executives of TRW, the Hartford Financial Group, Texaco, Bristol-Myers Squibb, Lockheed Martin and Pfizer.

The Senate appeared ready to give easy approval later this month to Rod Paige as education secretary. The former Houston schools chief sought to reassure top Democrats that private-school vouchers wouldn't be a priority in the new administration.

"What I am trying to find is what works," Paige, a self-described supporter of parental choice told the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee on Wednesday. "I think there is room for us to talk about this."

Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., who ran the hearing because Democrats have temporary control of the Senate, said, "We must not undermine public schools through private school voucher schemes. ... They are divisive issues that lead to needless partisan conflict."

Researchers develop 1st genetically altered monkey

■ DNA-modified primate brings ethical questions to forefront of science.

By WILLIAM MCCALL
The Associated Press

PORTLAND, Ore. — Pushing science to the brink of altering humans, researchers have created the world's first genetically modified primate — a baby rhesus monkey with jellyfish DNA that glows green in the dark.

The Oregon Health Science University researchers who created ANDi — for "inserted DNA," spelled backward — said their goal is not to tinker with the human blueprint but to use monkeys in the laboratory to advance medical research and wipe out diseases.

The researchers hope to introduce other genes in rhesus monkeys that could trigger diseases like Alzheimer's, diabetes, breast cancer or HIV.

Then, those monkeys could be used in experiments aimed at blocking diseases at the genetic level.

"I think we're at an extraordinary moment in the history of humans," said Dr. Gerald Schatten, who is leading the research at the Oregon Regional Primate Center.

Mice have been genetically modified in labs and used for medical research for decades, but ANDi proves that scientists now can successfully tinker with the chromosomes of a close genetic cousin to man.

"This is a step in the direction of working with an animal that is closer in biology to humans," said Dr. Phyllis Leppert at the National Institutes of Health, which funded the research.

She said mice have their limits when scientists try to apply experimental results to humans.

Rhesus monkeys, however, share roughly 95 percent of their genes with humans, she said.

ANDi's creation, detailed in Friday's issue of the journal Science, drew cautious and critical responses from scientists around the world.

"Although medical benefits may result from producing genetically modified monkeys, this sort of work must be subject to stringent monitoring," said Patrick Bateson, chairman of a Royal Society committee on genetically modified animals in Britain, where Dolly the sheep made international headlines after she was cloned in 1996.

Dr. Ray Greek, spokesman for the Physicians Committee for Responsible Medicine, questioned whether research using genetically modified monkeys someday would protect humans from cancer and heart disease.

"The odds are astronomically against it," he said. "We have been doing to mice for 20 to 30 years what they have done with ANDi, and we have been singularly unsuccessful, especially in cancer research."

America Online, Time Warner merger approved by commission

By KALPANA SRINIVASAN
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The $106 billion merger of America Online and Time Warner cleared its final government hurdle Thursday, and the two companies quickly closed their merger to create the nation's largest media empire.

Approval by the Federal Communications Commission came a year and a day after the companies announced their merger, originally valued at $165 billion.

The new business, to be called AOL Time Warner, combines the largest U.S. Internet provider — with 26 million subscribers — and a media titan that owns such popular entertainment titles as CNN, HBO, Sports Illustrated and Warner Bros.

"AOL Time Warner will lead the convergence of the media, entertainment, communications and Internet industries, and provide wide-ranging, innovative benefits for consumers," said new chairman Steve Case, after the deal closed late Thursday night. Time Warner Chairman Gerald Levin will be chief executive of the new business.

The FCC approved the deal after requiring the companies to take modest steps to open AOL's widespread instant messaging service to rival providers over Time Warner's cable lines. That issue caused protracted debate at the FCC, even though approval has long been expected.

William Kennard, the FCC chairman, said the marriage of old and new media presented the agency with unusual challenges. The commission sought to safeguard consumer choice for new Internet services, but at the same time did not want to regulate too heavily the still-emerging technologies, he said.

Antitrust regulators at the Federal Trade Commission cleared the deal in December, with broad restrictions to preserve consumer choice as the merged company gains a foothold in the markets for such services as high-speed Internet access.

The FCC built on some of the conditions the FTC imposed on Internet access. For example, AOL rivals carried on Time Warner's high-speed Internet cable lines should be able to directly bill their customers and control the content their customers first see when they log on. Time Warner also negotiated in good faith to carry small Internet providers on its systems.

AOL was told by the FCC it will have to make its next generation of instant messaging services offered over Time Warner's cable lines work with competing systems.

Those advanced services include video conferencing or the sharing of files over interactive television. That means somebody using a competing service could communicate with an AOL user in the way consumers now can exchange e-mail. The agency gave AOL several options for meetings its requirements.

AOL rivals Microsoft, Excite@Home and AT&T had sought a broader condition forcing AOL to open its existing messaging service — the real-time text messages millions of consumers now use — to all rivals.

Commissioner Gloria Tristani had strongly backed this position, but said she was pleased at the final, narrower outcome.

The commission took steps to ensure that AOL Time Warner could not cut exclusive deals with AT&T, the nation's largest cable company.

The FCC also said it would take a closer look at ways to ensure cable companies will not steer viewers away from competitors in the emerging market for interactive television. Interactive signals enable consumers to do things like look up information on a team while watching a sports game.

The cable industry balked at this plan, asserting that it is too early for the government to evaluate the emerging technology.

FUNDING

match that, and it was not recommended."

Brice Hobrock, dean of KSU Libraries, said this is the second year in a row the request has not been recommended by the governor.

"The plan was developed so we could use the funding for books and equipment," Hobrock said. "All we have received has been the $1 per credit hour increase, and that has only been used to cover inflation costs."

Although there are some needs that might go unmet and some budget cuts, Worcester said Graves made some positive suggestions in his address as well.

"We are very excited about the idea of tuition ownership," Worcester said. "A lot of the things Gov. Graves addressed will restructure higher education in Kansas."

Struve said K-State might have a more competitive edge with differential tuition rates, which was proposed by Graves.

"This may give us a competitive advantage," Struve said. "That is one of the more positive recommendations."

Struve said the faculty salary increase is another improvement.

"Gov. Graves recommended $8.4 million for faculty salary improvement, so of course that is pleasing to us," Struve said.

Struve said there have been dramatic changes in the state's philosophy for funding regents universities, and there always will be needs that are not met.

"There were some very positive suggestions for K-State in the address," Struve said. "We hope to get all our needs met, but it is too early to tell."

King's birthday remembered with day of community activities

By SHANNON MARSHALL
Kansas State Collegian

Members of the Junction City community observed Martin Luther King Jr. Day with a celebration embracing the rich diversity of America's culture.

The Faith Tabernacle Church in Junction City had its sixth annual "Dream in Reality" Cultural Day Celebration on Monday.

The ceremony began with a flag procession recognizing 21 of the 24 nationalities represented by the Faith Tabernacle congregation. Brightly colored flags from such countries as South Korea, Panama, Haiti and Mexico took their places at the front of the sanctuary, symbolically setting the stage for a celebration recognizing the importance of cultures co-existing in unity and peace.

Rogelio Gomez, a native of Panama and member of Faith Tabernacle, attended the ceremony with his wife, Matilde, and son, Rogelio. "My family and I are here today to celebrate Martin Luther King Jr.'s birthday and to try to bring his dream to reality," he said.

Following the flag ceremony, several

Kansas Board of Regents prepares to examine funding, management

By LUCAS SHIVERS
Kansas State Collegian

Funding, management and future operations are priorities facing the Kansas Board of Regents in the new year.

Since the enactment of the Kansas Higher Education Coordination Act two years ago, all seven universities, 19 community colleges and 11 technical schools are under the coordination of the nine-member board, Bill Docking, board member, said.

"It is a massive undertaking and an ongoing effort to create a seamless system and new structure," Docking said. "We are working to develop a comprehensive plan to benefit these institutions."

The changes over the past few years have allowed Kansas education to stay competitive with other states, Dick Carter, director of board relations, said.

In cooperation with the Kansas Legislature, the board deals with educational policies, programs and systems by sending proposals and recommendations. With no official power to make decisions, the board relies on the Legislature for deciding policies, Clay Blair, board president, said.

"The board is trusted to fulfill the mandate and expectations of the Legislature, yet we have no money to do it," Harry Craig, board member, said.

Historically, the governor's State of the State address has outlined recommendations for education. All too often, the Legislature perceives these numbers as the maximum amount of dollars to be used, Craig said.

As in any operation, funding is a continuous focus, Docking said

Cornerback declares NFL Draft eligibility

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

Cornerback Jerametrius Butler has forgone his senior season to declare eligibility for the 2001 NFL Draft.

The NFL announced Monday that Butler was one of 36 players granted special eligibility for the April 21-22 draft.

"It was a big surprise," Butler said, "but I had a good feeling at the end of the year because I had such a good junior season. That was one of my main reasons, but I just thought I could compete with the players at that level so I decided to put my name in and see what happens."

Ashcroft hearings start today

By CALVIN WOODWARD
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — John Ashcroft soon will be mingling with his friends back in the Senate, some of whom are ready to pounce.

But it isn't personal, Democrats said Sunday, while making clear they will not give him a pass to become the next attorney general just because they think he's a fine individual.

"Advise and consent doesn't mean advise and rubber stamp," said Vermont Sen. Patrick Leahy, the Judiciary Committee's senior Democrat and temporary chairman.

Democrats opposed to Ashcroft's nomination say his conservative opinions are ill-suited to the job of being the nation's top law enforcer.

"Right now we need a healer in Washington, in the form of our president

NEWS OF THE WEIRD

In December, NBC News, citing Pentagon and intelligence sources, reported that thousands of Sony PlayStation 2s may have been purchased by Iraqi sources recently, to capitalize on the device's powerful computer processor and video cards, possibly to use in connection with weapons systems. One expert told the World Net Daily news service that an integrated bundle of 12 to 15 PlayStation 2s could provide enough power to control a chemical-weapons-delivering Iraqi aircraft. A Sony spokesperson said it was unlikely anyone could buy thousands of units.

Reagan recovers after surgery on broken hip

SANTA MONICA, Calif. — Former President Reagan was able to sit up in a chair the day after surgery to repair a broken hip, one of his doctors said Monday.
"He remarkably was up in a chair yesterday, the first day post-op," Dr. Kevin Ehrhart, his orthopedic surgeon, told ABC's "Good Morning America." "That's a goal you obtain about half the time. He did it on the first try."
He said the former president also was eating.
Reagan, suffering from Alzheimer's disease and nearing his 90th birthday Feb. 6, fell Friday at his Bel-Air home. Doctors used a pin, plate and screws to repair the joint Saturday in a 65-minute operation.

Supplies for quake relief delivered to El Salvador

MIAMI — A Miami-Dade County emergency response team took critical supplies to El Salvador Sunday, a day after an earthquake buried thousands of homes in the Central American nation.
The emergency aid, coordinated by the U.S. Agency for International Development, included 25,000 pounds of blankets, medical kits, drinking water and plastic tarps for makeshift shelters.

A five-member Disaster Assistance Response Team will distribute supplies and help assess damage and needs in El Salvador. The magnitude-7.6 quake Saturday left more than 200 people dead and some 1,200 missing.

California officials work on electricity solution

LOS ANGELES — A live satellite hook-up linking both coasts had state and federal officials negotiating with utility company chiefs Saturday on a deal that could make California a long-term electricity broker.

A state agency, under emergency powers from Washington, already has spent roughly $30 million buying electricity in the past month to stave off rolling blackouts during the California power crisis. Officials want the state to expand and continue wholesale electricity buys, selling the power to utility companies, said Steve Maviglio, a spokesman for Gov. Gray Davis.

It was expected that the meeting, which remained under way in Los Angeles and in Washington D.C. late Saturday afternoon, would lead to further negotiations over the next two days, said Gene Sperling, President Clinton's top economic adviser.

Students volunteer for MLK Jr. day of service

By KRISTEN DYMACEK
Kansas State Collegian

Wearing his purple K-State ball cap and his white Wonder Workshop Children's Museum T-shirt, 7-year-old Curtis Stepp showed off his newly-made necklace.

"I just designed it using paint markers," Stepp said.

"I found out which colors to use and which ones not to use on my necklace," he said. "The second one's a lot better than my first one."

Stepp's necklace, which was made up of two brightly colored wooden people cutouts, was just one of the many arts and crafts items that could be made at the Wonder Workshop's activity table at Wal-Mart on Monday.

The Wonder Workshop's arts and crafts table was part of the Martin Luther King Jr. Day of Service community activities, sponsored by the K-State Community Service Program.

Student coordinator Abby Hall said people had an opportunity to choose from 15 community agencies where they could volunteer, ranging from cleaning at the Sunset Zoological Park to visiting with residents at the Meadowlark Hill Retirement Community.

Volunteers met at the Manhattan Town Center on Monday and signed up for a three-hour shift with the community agency based on their interests.

Hall said the Martin Luther King Jr. holiday was a great time for students to participate in a community service.

"It's a day off from school.

Students can't use the excuse that they don't have any time to help," she said.

"It's important for students to give back to the community," Hall said, "and this is a good day to do it."

Rebecca Wood, Community Service Program's Learn and Serve Coordinator, said she expected between 125 and 150 people to participate in the day's events.

Wood said by volunteering, people could really experience this year's Day of Service motto, "Everybody can be great because anybody can serve," a quote by King.

"Volunteers feel like they've really helped in a way," she said.

"It gives them a sense of real issues and real problems in the community."

Volunteer Beth Jantz, sophomore in interior design, said she never had participated in a group community service event and chose to help at the Wonder Workshop table because she wanted to get a lot out of it.

"I feel like I'm sheltered sometimes," Jantz said. "This will help me open my eyes."

Sarah Kingsley, junior in animal science, said volunteering for one of the community service events was a good opportunity to remember King.

"This isn't just a day to sleep in or Wood said volunteers often continue helping in the community after participating in the Day of Service.

"It makes people consider the quality of life rather than just the quantity of what we have in the community," she said.

speakers from various nationalities within the congregation gave brief histories and explanations of their native countries and the struggles they encountered in their homelands. Each speaker emphasized his or her desire to continue Martin Luther King Jr.'s dream into the 21st century.

Alberto Allamby, a native of Panama, likened his country to the United States because of its similar cultural mix.

"We have many different cultures represented in Panama, and we have encountered some of the same issues as the United States," he said.

Several musical performances also were included in the program, including a musical presentation by the Faith Tabernacle Spanish Band and the Faith Tabernacle Tillman Singers. The ceremony ended with a dramatization.

After the ceremony at the church, members traveled to the 4-H Center building on Spring Valley Road in Junction City, where congregation members had prepared various foods from individual nationalities. Arroz con pollo (rice with chicken) from Puerto Rico, and chili and cornbread from Mexico were just two dishes available for sampling.

Members of the congregation expressed enthusiasm at Monday's ceremony about acceptance of all cultures — not just the African-American culture.

Edwin Melendez, a native of Puerto Rico, said the church is a place that is a source of love and unity for all its members.

"This is our home church," he said. "It is good to know that the emphasis of this day is not just to the African-American culture. It is extended to everybody of every nationality. This is how it is all the time at this church, not just today."

"I enjoyed everything about today," she said.

"I'm thankful to God that we could come together with all these nationalities. This is Martin Luther King Jr.'s dream."

Her daughter said she agreed.

"I love all the singing, the skits and just because all of the colors can come together in unity as one," she said.

A member of the administrative committee for the day's celebration, Felicia Grant, was active in the planning of the "Dream in Reality" ceremony. She said she hoped as an outcome of the ceremony, more people in the community would realize the diversity of the Faith Tabernacle congregation.

"I hope that this brings more people out to see that this church holds all kinds of nationalities," she said.

"We are a family. Even though we are all of different nationalities, we still get along together. We truly hold the dream of Martin Luther King Jr."

What are "morality-based" television shows? Obviously, you don't mean "Temptation Island" or "Jerry Springer." I don't even know what that is.

This goes for the current topic about reality-based television shows — I guess fiction just wasn't boring enough.

Students should investigate city/university transit plan

Editor,
Is it in the best interest of the K-State students to pay for a bus system for the city?

The commission wants the student population to absorb the price tag. It intends to increase privilege fees by at least $10 a semester.

The city can only go along with the transit idea as long as they have the support of the students. Mayor Karen McCulloh's biggest point was having a bus for people when their cars broke down.

Dear Mayor, will you sell your car and ride the bus every day?
Maybe then I'll support your idea.

OPINION

Living the dream

King's legacy remains to remind us to value inner strength, not appearance

This column is perhaps the most meaningful one I will write all semester. That said, I'd appreciate it if you would bear with me, since I'm a lot better at "contrived and wacky" than I am at "thoughtful." I had intended to write something humorous for today, but then I started thinking about the reason why there was no school yesterday.

For those few of you who don't know, our day off was due to the memory of a man named Martin Luther King Jr. This man had a big dream: He dreamed of a day when people would not be judged by their outward appearances, but by the quality of their characters. This theme is prevalent not only in his August 1963 "I Have a Dream" speech at the March on Washington, but also in many of his other speeches and sermons.

King believed that all men truly are created equal, and he lived his life in a manner that clearly reflected this belief. He inspired numerous social reforms, and he also helped to unite the civil rights movement. His ideas continue to live on today, nearly 33 years after his death at the hands of an assassin.

Although, many who are much more thoughtful than me have already asked this question numerous times during the commemoration ceremonies of the past weekend, I still think that it is beneficial for us to ask ourselves, "What would King say if he were alive today?" Would he be pleased with how we are and what we are becoming? Would he agree with our focus as a society? Would he say that we haven't yet begun to work on certain vital areas?

I think that his message to us would be mixed. Certainly, we have come a long way in our fight for the rights of minorities. In this, we've followed his vision. The problem is that our culture and society haven't really taken his ultimate message to heart at all. What did King really stand for? He once said in a sermon at the Ebenezer Baptist Church in Atlanta that "... all men are equal in intrinsic worth." This assertion isn't referring only to men. Every woman, every child, every human being on the face of this planet is valuable simply because he or she is part of the human race.

Later, in the same sermon, King said:

"... [T]here are no gradations in the image of God. Every man from a treble white to a bass black is significant on God's keyboard, precisely because every man is made in the image of God. One day we will learn that. We will know one day that God made us to live together as brothers and to respect the dignity and worth of every man."

The point is that we should treat all humans with love and respect, regardless of who they are. While in one sense the social reforms that grew from the civil rights movement in the 1960s furthered this idea, they also provided a potential threat to King's vision.

Because of the social reforms, it's easy to sit back and say, "Well, we're equal now. We don't have to worry about it any more." This complacency is the very thing that King would have warned us against. The social changes may also have had a detrimental effect on King's ideals because they focused on certain racial differences. While this was necessary at the time, it has served to put the real issue on the back burner. King was not concerned with merely racial issues. Neither was he concerned with economic or gender equality so much as he was with love. In his view, the primary objective in life was to live in a manner not controlled by external appearances, but rather by inner motivations.

In our society, we place an incredible amount of emphasis on a person's outward appearance. We judge others for what they appear to be without even stopping to look at their characters. We glorify the prettiest, the smartest, the most athletic, the funniest people without really asking ourselves about the quality of their inner selves.

What have we become? Are we really any better off than we were in the 1960s? Is there anyone in this nation who looks beyond the surface and endeavors to love everyone, regardless of what they may appear to be?

If we truly wish to honor King's memory by continuing his vision, perhaps we should begin to focus less on social reforms and more on personal responsibility. Change doesn't start with society in general; it starts with you and me. Let's try to look past what's external and start valuing people for who and what they truly are.

Success, wealth don't guarantee happiness

So, did you get a lot of good presents for Christmas? Now that it's four weeks later, do you feel that your overall level of happiness is any greater for having received these gifts? If you're like most people to whom I've talked, you're about as miserable now as you were prior to the gift-getting holidays.

But shouldn't you be happier now? Weren't you successful in getting a lot of good stuff? In light of how well the economy has been doing over the last decade, we should all be feeling better and better all the time.

And it's not just the last decade. The 20th century, being the first century that has meticulously measured all forms of human activity, has shown that by nearly every measure, this past century has been very good to America.

Common even to those that live below the poverty line, many of today's items such as electricity, refrigerators, central heating and flush toilets, were practically nonexistent 100 years ago. Most people considered to be impoverished in the United States at least own a television and a microwave.

In 1900, the average life expectancy was 47; the average hourly pay (adjusted for inflation) was $3.80; percentage of people with high school diplomas was 13, and the number of doctorates awarded was 382. Today, the average life expectancy is 77, the average hourly pay is $13.90, percentage of people with high school diplomas is 83, and the number of doctorates awarded is around 46,000.

If the 20th century teaches us anything, it's that capitalistic democracy is the best system to date for amassing wealth. And why not? — being that amassing wealth is the objective of capitalism.

But there's another number that is on the increase; the number of people who are depressed. At any given time, 18 million people in the United States are afflicted with depression, one in five over the course of a lifetime, and it's affecting people at younger and younger ages. Since World War II, the gross domestic product has tripled while, over the same time, depression has doubled.

Not all this depression can be attributed to greater awareness. Some of the rise in depression may be caused from exposure to chemicals in our environment. Others believe it could be from nutritional deficiencies, but that's hard to believe in a country where people die from eating too much.

Most attribute the increase in depression to the disintegration of the community. All this great technology has made us less dependent on direct help from others. I can do my banking, shop for my groceries and purchase the gasoline to shuttle myself between all these places without having to deal with another human being.

The reason many of us are so miserable is because we confuse success with happiness. As my grandmother used to say, "Success is getting what we want, and happiness is wanting what we get."

Unfortunately, as University of Illinois psychologist Ed Diener explains, the more successful we become, the more we think it takes to make us happy.

"If you start making $100,000 a year, it takes $200,000 to make us happy," Diener says. "People start expecting more out of life."

We are forever trapped pursuing happiness because, instead of pursuing happiness, we pursue success.

Russell Roberts, an economist at American University, talks about the measurable and immeasurable economy. Consumer buying is part of the measurable economy. It's easy to count up all the new cars Americans purchased last year. A hike in the woods is part of the

It's easy to count up all the new cars Americans purchased last year. A hike in the woods is part of the immeasurable economy. immeasurable economy. No one has yet figured out how to quantify the wealth one receives by taking a nature walk. And besides, who has time to go for a hike since we're all too busy trying to be successful in the measurable economy?

As far as being happy, one can follow the advice of the British playwright and comedian Arthur Smith: "If you want to be happy for a short time, get drunk; happy for a long time, fall in love; happy forever, take up gardening." I can attest to the first part.

Anyway, happy New Year.

A candle is held in remembrance of Martin Luther King Jr. on Monday night at All Faiths Chapel.

Community remembers King's legacy

By ANGIE JOHNSON
Kansas State Collegian

Besides the fact that Monday was a day out of school, Amy Burgardt was curious as to how people celebrate Martin Luther King Jr. Day.

She decided to attend some of the events that were planned in his honor, including the memorial walk and candlelight vigil Tuesday night.

"I was impressed by the amount of people who attended and the ways they both aloud and silently acknowledged him," Burgardt, junior in social work, said.

She said it was time she got involved in some of the day's activities.

"It was a new experience for me," Burgardt said. "Besides having a day off of school, I wanted to see how people actually celebrated the day."

The first activity she participated in was the memorial walk, sponsored by the Alpha Phi Alpha fraternity.

K-State students and community members walked in silence to honor King on his nationally celebrated birthday.

Members of the fraternity were stationed at St. Isidore's Catholic Student Center and at the Derby and Kramer dining centers to meet with community members and march in silence — just as King did.

The groups congregated at the free-speech zone north of the K-State Student Union to listen to a speaker and sing in King's honor.

"As opposed to years past, we decided to meet at separate locations in order to become more visibly seen and allow the public to really see what we are doing," said Carlos Etter, chairman of the event and senior in management information systems.

Outside the Union, Don Fallon, university coordinator of religious activities, addressed the crowd, explaining that in 1968, just before King's death, King visited Ahearn Field House to speak before a large crowd.

His theme was that we have come a long way, but we have a long way to go.

"This particular evening, we want to come together walking hand-in-hand with people of other ethnicities and racial background to courageously confront those barriers of discrimination and violence," Fallon said.

Following the speech, the group walked to All Faiths Chapel, singing, "We Shall Overcome."

The audience included community and organization members of diverse ethnic and racial backgrounds. One organization that attended was the Chi Omega sorority, which met as a house to be represented at the ceremony.

"This gave our house a great opportunity to participate in King's celebration and stay open to new ideas," said Jessica Butterfield, sophomore in biology and pre-medicine.

The candlelight vigil, with the theme of "Remember, Celebrate, Act," featured the black national anthem, a video presentation of the "I Have a Dream" speech, several song selections and a lighting of candles.

President Jon Wefald also spoke regarding his experiences attending the annual event over the past decade.

"Celebrating the birthday of a great black American man with such a large crowd of people who are concerned, shows that his dream is coming true, and he is alive and well," Wefald said.

K-State research benefits Kansas economic growth

■ Carnegie Foundation awards university with 'doctoral/research' honor.

By NICK BRATKOVIC
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's research base exceeded $100 million in the year 2000, and for every dollar provided in support to the university, it returned $17 to the state's economy.

Research is an area the university has worked to improve in recent years, and associate provost and director of planning and analysis Ron Downey said the research spans across the board.

"We have research in areas such as biology, physics and chemistry," Downey said. "Not to mention agriculture, all of the university's different areas have research and are receiving grants."

The research grants work to fund salaries and use of facilities, along with the cost of supplies and other aspects involved in research, Downey said.

The way money is distributed to the state's economy is two-fold.

The funds being brought in for research contribute to the first phase of research's effect on the state's economy.

Downey said the grants work to fund programs and salaries in the research process. Additional funds are produced from profits made from research projects conducted at K-State and in the commercial market.

Downey said a leading area of research at K-State is agriculture. Such projects in the College of Agriculture include the development of new strands or hybrids of wheat, which can generate millions and upwards of billions of dollars, Downey said.

"The dollars generate additional activity in the state," Downey said.

In addition, the College of Agriculture has developed new beef processing systems and works to continue research in developing more efficient wheat that can be patented and sold commercially.

The success results from research programs K-State has developed in the last 12 years, Downey said.

It was during this time that K-State developed an office of pre-awards to increase the university's ability to attract research grants, Downey said.

"We made strides over that first six- or seven-year period," he said.

"But in the last few years, we have made bigger strides in terms of production. We are not done yet."

It is research improvements that have been recognized by the Carnegie Foundation as the school was awarded the distinction of "doctoral/research."

President Jon Wefald said it was one of his goals when he came to K-State in the mid-1980s, along with increasing enrollment from 14,000 to 22,000 and building a new library.

Faculty senate president Michael Ransom said the Carnegie Foundation's distinction of "doctoral/research university, extensive" is an accomplishment for the school.

"In research, it puts us in the highest class possible," he said. "This institution is performing at the highest level and is now in that upper tier."

Bears slip by Cats 55-63 after half-time tie

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

The K-State's men's basketball team might have entered halftime tied with Baylor 32-32 Saturday night, but the victory already was in the bag — for the Bears.

After leading 30-23 with four minutes remaining in the first half, K-State allowed the Bears to go on a 9-2 scoring run to tie the game up. From that point on, the eventual 55-63 loss to Baylor might have been a forgone conclusion, head coach Jim Wooldridge said.

"That was pretty big. There's some validity in that too, that we perhaps might have lost the ball game at that moment," he said.

Until that moment, K-State had, for the most part, played well enough to win. The Cats shot 42.3 percent from the field, 10 points better than Baylor, and out-rebounded the Bears, 19-16. The stage was set for K-State's second Big 12 win of the season, but the Cats just couldn't finish it, forward Travis Reynolds said.

"When you've got teams like that on your home floor, you've just got to smell blood and try and put them away," he said. "It was a tied ball game coming out of halftime, and they just came out with more energy and played harder than we did."

K-State would shoot just 25 percent in the second half, allowing Baylor to run the score to 36-48 with 9:22 remaining to play, a fact not lost on the handful of Baylor fans at the game. One loud individual actually began a minute-to-minute countdown on how long it would take K-State to score more than four points in the half.

The countdown would last for 11 minutes.

K-State's dry streak was ended when point guard Larry Reid hit a three-point shot to pull the Cats to within 39-48. Guard Phineas Atchison then would knock down another three-pointer just under a minute later.

K-State eventually would narrow the score to Cats look toward offense in tonight's Big 12 matchup

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

"Defense wins championships" might be the old adage, but after shooting 19 for 58 in Saturday's 55-63 loss to Baylor, K-State's offense must again take an overwhelming priority.

For the second straight game, after connecting on just 14 of 46 shots against Texas last Wednesday, the Wildcats' scoring production has, needless to say, its share of concerns.

Head coach Jim Wooldridge knows it, too, but unfortunately for him, a clear-cut answer isn't at the tip of his tongue.

"It'll be interesting to see how or if we can score the ball better," Wooldridge said. "As a coach, it's hard to make a guy make a jump shot. I think you have to evaluate — are we getting shots, are we getting our team in an offensive rhythm?"

"Odds are, there's going to be a game where we find a better rhythm, guys make more shots, and maybe we can play our way out of it. But that's got to be our hope, that's got to be our goal — that we just play better offense and make more shots."

That wish looks to be answered tonight, as Missouri (12-3, 3-0 Big 12) takes on K-State (7-7, 1-2) at Bramlage Coliseum.

But in attempting to cure their scoring slump, the Cats will have to get their offense going no matter what defense the Tigers play.

Cats deal with season-high turnovers in Saturday loss to Kansas

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

LAWRENCE — One word described K-State's 78-67 loss to intrastate rival Kansas on Saturday. Ugly.

Though the Cats finished with more rebounds and a higher field goal percentage than the Jayhawks, K-State (10-5, 0-4) could not overcome a season-high 29 turnovers in suffering its fourth-straight conference loss of the season.

After the game, K-State head coach Deb Patterson took responsibility for not having her players ready to play a consistent and complete game, and said the Cats are struggling to find an identity in the Big 12.

"We're playing segments of a basketball game competitively," Patterson said, "and then we're allowing the dam to break."

That dam broke early and often Saturday, and the Kansas (7-7, 1-2) defense seemed to be a big part of the Cats' struggles. In fact, almost half of K-State's turnovers were forced by a scrappy Jayhawk defense led by senior Jaclyn Johnson and junior KC Hilgenkamp who combined for eight of KU's 14 steals.

"I think we were much more aggressive defensively," Kansas head coach Marian Washington said. "Tonight I think we did a better job keeping good pressure on them."

Saturday's win over the Cats gave the Jayhawks their first win in the Big 12, their 11th straight over K-State in Allen Fieldhouse, and ended a four-game losing streak, dating back to Dec. 29.

Kansas was clicking on both sides of the court early, jumping out to a quick 11-5 lead behind 71-percent shooting and four early mistakes by the Cats. The Jayhawks would never relinquish the lead.

Kansas senior Jennifer Jackson scored six points in that stretch and 23 in the game to lead all scorers. The Jayhawk guard gave the Cats headaches all afternoon, adding three steals and three assists to her 12 first-half points.

K-State shot 53-percent from the floor in the first half, but took only 19 shots, and freshman Nicole Ohlde was limited to just three attempts in the paint.

"They played good defense in the post," Ohlde said. "They weren't letting us catch the ball, which hurt us down low."

The Jayhawk post trio of Johnson, Hilgenkamp and Brooke Reeves poured in 20 points in the paint in the first half while keeping

Freshman dominates triple, long jump events at indoor KSU Invitational

By ERIKA SAUERWEIN
Kansas State Collegian

Before her triple and long jump events, freshman Queeneth Evurunobi distances herself from the people and distractions around her.

She sits and thinks about what goals she wants to accomplish and what marks she wants to jump that day.

"I just get in a zone where I am like, 'Nobody mess with me, nobody touch me,'" she said. "I've got to focus, and if I don't, I'm not going to do so good."

Evurunobi has been focusing a lot lately.

Her win in both the triple and the long jump events helped K-State win its own KSU Invitational Indoor track and field meet at Ahearn Field House on Friday. The Wildcats won six events and finished with a total of 152.50 points. Nebraska took second with 141 points.

The men's team tallied 164.5 points in its second-place finish to No. 16 Nebraska.

Although Evurunobi has won both the triple jump and long jump competitions in the past two meets, she still hasn't reached the marks she desires. She tallied two personal bests Friday by jumping 40 feet in the triple jump and 19feet, 5 1/2 inches in the long jump, but said she is still striving for the NCAA-qualifying mark of 19 feet, 11 inches.

Head coach Cliff Rovelto said Evurunobi hasn't come close to reaching her peak.

"As she gets better in shape and we move her approach back, she will jump significantly farther as the year goes on," he said. "She is a long ways from what she is capable of doing. She is a young pup. She has no idea what's going on around her."

Being a freshman, Evurunobi said she gets a little intimidated when competing. She said she is behind in marks compared to the quality jumpers in the nation, but she is willing to work to get to that level.

Not only is she lifting more, running and performing plyometrics, but she is also still learning the triple-jump technique.

"My stuff is backwards from high school," she said. "We trained more on the first step and the last jump, but here we train more on your second step than your first. I get frustrated easily, so I need to learn patience with myself and listen to my coaches."

Evurunobi wasn't the only athlete to place well in the meet. Rebekah Green, a redshirt freshman, won the shot put and weight throw. Her 52 feet, 11 inch throw in shot put was not only a meet record, but also a NCAA-qualifying mark.

Korene Hinds won the 1,000 meters in a time of 2:50.91. She won the event by almost a 12-second margin. Amanda Crouse won the 800 meters in a time of 2:14.16.

"I think [the meet] went very well," Rovelto said. "What was really impressive, I think, was a lot of the young kids. Some of them had winning performances, but even some of them were seconds and thirds in events. They really competed well. People wanted to suck it up."

The K-State men's team won five events in its second-place finish. Nebraska came from behind late in the meet and finished strong with a win in pole vault and high jump.

"If we stay healthy and continue to make the kind of progress we've made over the last couple of months, we have a pretty decent men's team," Rovelto said. "A lot better than it has been in the past couple of years. We are more complete. We have a couple of quality guys in every event."

In his first meet as a Wildcat, Shadrack Kimeli won two events in the 800 meters and the 3,000 meters. His times were 1:53.55 and 8:38.89, respectively. Cedric El-Idrissi won the 400 meters, and Istvan Nagy sprinted just ahead of teammate Jean-Paul Niyongabo to finish with a time of 2:31.50.

The Wildcats meet again at Ahearn Field House for the Wildcat Invitational this weekend. The men compete Friday and the women Saturday.

"You normally have to run two or three races before you really start to get your timing," Rovelto said. "It will be another three or four weeks before you start seeing really the best times or the big jumps."

K-State freshman Queeneth Evurunobi won both the triple jump and long jump Friday at the KSU Invitational indoor track meet in Ahearn Field House. Evurunobi jumped 40 feet in the triple jump and 19 feet, 5 1/2 inches in the long jump.

44-51 with 5:40 left to play, but the game already was out of reach, Wooldridge said.

"My thought down the stretch was pretty much desperation at that point," he said. "I don't think we had done anything in the second half that up to that point would lead me to believe that things were really coming together."

"We got a few stops, and if we had made a basket and got that thing to three or four or two, now we're looking at a different scenario, but we weren't able to do that."

While K-State was unable to put together any kind of offensive rhythm in the second half, the team's defense still fought hard. Baylor forward Terry Black came into the contest averaging 16 points per game but scored just seven points against the Cats, a statistic that did please Wooldridge.

"I thought some of our guys did a pretty good job that weren't guarding him to help guard him. That was a part of our game plan," he said. "We didn't want him to go Phi Slamma Jamma on us. We wanted to cut down the driving lanes and get back down the floor on defensive transition to limit his opportunities around the basket."

Another hopeful statistic for K-State was the game's attendance, which at 9,799, was easily a season-high.

"I just loved the crowd. The attendance tonight was super," Wooldridge said. "The fans tonight were great. Hopefully we didn't disappoint them enough that they won't come back. We need them to come back."

If the fans do return, they eventually will see an improved K-State basketball team, Wooldridge said.

"It's all going to work out. I believe we'll get better," he said. "We're a team that knows we're going to have setbacks, but we've just got to keep trying to improve."

However, if the outcome of the K-State/Baylor contest was any indication, MU head coach Quin Snyder well might have his squad playing a plain 2-3 zone much of the game. After all, it seemed to work to perfection for the Bears.

Then again, Wooldridge said his team hasn't had success against other defensive sets either.

"We played 40 minutes of offense vs. a zone (against Baylor), but whether it be a zone or a man, we have really struggled to score this basketball," he said. "It has been a problem, and it is a problem, so we again find ourselves having to do all these things at such a high level—rebounding, defending, hustling—all the elements of the game that can help offset lack of scoring."

"We're just not quite good enough to handle that right now. That's the story—just lack of scoring."

Missouri, on the other hand, didn't have much trouble scoring in its last outing, a 112-109, four-overtime upset of No. 18 Iowa State.

Yet, after looking at that contest, K-State's defensive game plan tonight might be quite simple: stop Clarence Gilbert and Kareem Rush.

Gilbert led the Tigers with a career-high 43 points against the Cyclones, and Rush added 32, as those two players combined to take 67 of Mizzou's 90 shot attempts.

K-State might not have that caliber of offensive weapons, but the Cats can still score if they look past their recent offensive inconsistencies.

"You've got to put it behind you and just move on for the next one," Reynolds said Saturday. "Guys have to come in the gym tomorrow early before practice and work on shooting the ball—making short shots, making long shots. We've just got to work on our offensive end and just try and put the ball in the basket, basically."

"We've got to come in tomorrow and get ready to play a game. We've got to come out and work hard these next two days and get ready for Tuesday. Missouri's a big game, almost like a rival game."

the Cats' Andrea Armstrong and Ohide to just six.

The second half began much as the first had ended. Kansas opened with a 10-4 run that gave the Jayhawks their biggest lead, 27, at the 13:50 mark.

However, with most of Kansas' starters on the bench in the final minutes of the game, K-State managed to reduce the margin to 11, behind a 14-2 run in the game's final 3:43.

Junior guard Kristin Rethman went five-of-five from the field and eight-of-eight from the charity stripe to finish the game with 22 points to lead the Cats. However, Rethman also led the team in turnovers with six, something she said is unacceptable for the Wildcats' veteran perimeter players.

"We're experienced enough at the guard position that we have to be able to step up and be able to handle that pressure," she said.

Pressure of a different sort will increase Wednesday night for the Cats when K-State will be host to the nationally-ranked Texas Longhorns (14-4, 2-2) at Bramlage Coliseum. K-State again will be looking for its first conference win against Texas stars Tracy Cook and Stacy Stephens, who both recorded double doubles in the Longhorn's 64-43 win over Oklahoma State on Saturday.

Student wins $1,000 in contest sponsored by bank

KAREN MIKOLS/Collegian

Sean Leary, senior in operations management, won $1,000 from Commerce Bank in the "Skip the PIN, Sign — and Win" competition. The contest was sponsored by Commerce Bank and ran from Nov. 1 to Jan. 1 in order to encourage bank customers' use of the Visa Check Card.

By MICHELLE BERTUGLIA
Kansas State Collegian

He got the luck of the draw. Sean Leary, senior in operations management, won $1,000 in Commerce Bank's "Skip the PIN, Sign — and Win" contest Dec. 23.

Leary said he was not even trying to win the contest. "I had heard about the contest, but I did not really think about winning it," he said.

"Skip the PIN, Sign — and Win," was a contest sponsored by Commerce Bank and ran from Nov. 1 to Jan. 1.

Lori Magana, branch manager at Commerce Bank, Westloop Branch, said the purpose of the contest was to promote using the Visa Check Card as a credit card.

If cardholders used the check card as a credit card from November through January, they automatically were placed in a daily drawing for $1,000 and in the final drawing of $25,000 Jan. 10.

Leary said in the months the contest ran, he estimated registering a total of four or five times. He said the bank left a message for him Dec. 23, but due to the bank being closed for the holidays

"I think I am going to start playing the Lotto now."

— Sean Leary, senior in operations management

he did not find out about winning until Dec. 26.

"It was a good surprise when I found out," Leary said.

A $1,000-richer Leary said he went on a shopping spree and bought speakers, CDs, beer and took a trip to the casinos. Not spending all the money, though, Leary said he tucked some away for the spring semester.

Check Card manager, said out of the 61 $1,000 winners, he was glad at least one college student won.

"I think it is fantastic he won," Bradbury said. "The branch in Manhattan and on campus wants to serve the needs of the students. You guys need the money more than anyone else."

Bradbury said the reason Commerce wanted to promote the use of the check card as a credit card was because of the extra benefits people receive when using the credit card. Some of the benefits include enhancement price guarantee, extended warranty, damage protection and dispute protection.

Unsure if they will make the contest an annual event, Bradbury said he felt the contest was successful.

Leary said he doesn't usually enter contests, but his newfound luck has inspired him to participate in more contests in the future.

"I think I am going to start playing the Lotto now," Leary said.

KC Royals lose baseball great, opportunity to become strong team

Of all the losses a fan can endure, the loss of a hero certainly is the hardest to accept.

For fans of the Kansas City Royals, last week's news brought the startling realization that outfielder, team leader and local hero Johnny Damon had been shipped away on the fast track to playoff contention. Baseball's premier lead-off hitter saw his contract rights traded west to the Oakland Athletics.

From the three-way trade with the A's and the Tampa Bay Devil Rays, the Royals received a reliever with a right arm older than newsprint and the affirmation that the youth movement plan they had espoused to bring postseason glory has met a grim fate called reality.

The Royals got about as much as they could have with the trade of their budding superstar. The addition of the ancient, but reliable, reliever Roberto Hernandez and minor-leaguers A. J. Hinch and Angel Berroa were decent moves, and trading Damon was the only option available to The Royals' General Manager, Allard Baird.

Last year, Johnny Damon's numbers were sparkling. His seasonlong batting average was .327, and he hit a remarkable .386 after the All-Star break. He belted 214 hits, scored 136 runs, hit 88 RBIs, and led the league with 46 stolen bases.

For many fans, Damon's importance went far beyond statistics. Johnny was born outside Kansas City. Like many of his fans, he grew up wearing Royal blue and attending games at Kauffman Stadium. He's never worn a jersey that had anything other than "Kansas City" printed across the chest. As one fan lamented, "He was one of us."

Johnny Damon's loyalty to the Royals was a blessing for the city, but it should have been the greatest assurance that he eventually would leave. After all, this is baseball in the 21st century. The off-season isn't only for recuperation. It's for renegotiation and remuneration.

Statistics mean dollars, and Johnny Damon has just batted, fielded and priced himself out of Kansas City's budget. Free agency might mean freedom for the players, but it shackles fans of small-budget teams to a near assurance of mediocrity.

This trade dealt with far more than statistics and numbers. The Royals traded away the faint chance of hope meeting fruition. They proved to the world that the Royals are not competitive with contracts or competitive on the field.

For years, fans of this team have accepted losing seasons as the hard road toward success. As Kansas City's potential-filled young players developed into successful, experienced players, the Royals were going to rise among baseball's elite. This was the essence of the youth movement that had Johnny Damon at the center.

In August of 1999, the San Francisco Chronicle proclaimed that Kansas City was going nowhere with its roster of 20-year-olds.

By October 2000, that assessment had been rebuked. The Royals had just won seventy-seven games. Winning 87 would have put them in playoff contention. The boys in Blue were on the cusp of validating the youth movement as a success.

But on Monday, Jan. 8, 2001, the Kansas City Royals traded away Johnny Damon, and with him, the hopes of so many fans. The trade has shown the realism behind Kansas City's plans, and it has taught us a lesson about baseball. Young Royals players don't grow up to lead this team. Kansas City players grow up to play for better teams with bigger salaries and newer stadiums.

Damon's trade proves that.

A story former baseball commissioner A. Bartlett Giamatti wrote for Harper's Magazine told of a banner that hung from the upper deck of Shea Stadium on June 16, 1977.

Legendary pitcher and hero Tom Seaver recently had been shipped away by the New York Mets management. The message on the banner was short, and it captured the grief felt by every Mets fan who ever had watched Tom Seaver confound the game's best hitters:

"I was a believer/But now we've lost Seaver."

And so, Tom Seaver the man, and Tom Seaver the legend, was sent to Cincinnati, where he never would be as dazzling or as appreciated.

Damon is not the same player that Seaver was, but for Kansas City fans, he was the hero we admired and the player we aspired to be.

Whether the Royals can win without Johnny is a question that can't yet be answered, but one fact is for sure.

Baseball has lost one more believer.

LOCAL TALENT

WHO: Ernie Saville, aka DJ Atumie, senior in kinesiology

Ernie Saville, the DJ also known as Atumie, spins progressive house and progressive trance techno music.

Saville does a radio show from 8 p.m. to 6 a.m. Fridays on KSDB-FM 91.9. He has been working on his craft for five years, learning through his own efforts and from the assistance of other DJs.

Saville also spins his music from 10 p.m. to 2 a.m. every Thursday at Elements of Taste. The weekly set, known as "Elements of Sound" keeps Saville in practice, so he can consistently spin in front of a live audience. He also plays parties, raves and clubs.

Paying attention to track selection and lineup is important for a DJ who wants to be able to please an audience, he said.

"The thing I like most about spinning is just how much I enjoy the music and watching the people dance and seeing the enjoyment they get from the music," he said.

SEEING THROUGHOBS

Xuhong Shang, associate professor of art, uses abstract minimal conceptual style in his artwork. He incorporates ancient Chinese styles with modern painting techniques, as well as uses modernistic styles of painting.

KAREN MIKOLS/
Collegian

Professor seeks to balance instruction, artistry

By JJ DUNCAN
Kansas State Collegian

Images of dark, serene mountains, painted from a distance, are contrasted by the harsh white bars that obscure them in the paintings, some of them packed for shipping, that fill the studio of Xuhong Shang.

Shang, associate professor of art, has been packing away pieces from his "Mountain Series" in huge wooden crates, addressed to Hong Kong with black-magic marker.

"The gallery will pay for the shipping on these crates," he said, "but they will easily cost over $3,000 to ship to Hong Kong by air."

This is nothing new for the artist, who sometimes has to pay his own shipping costs. Pieces of Shang's work are being displayed in Chicago, and other pieces will soon go through New York and Singapore as well. He is accustomed to showing his work internationally.

Shang has had a long journey from learning basic artistic skills within the cultural revolution of communist China to teaching his craft at K-State. His travels around the world have given him a better understanding of the many cultures that exist that can help any artist, he said. Not even he knows for sure where his journeys will take him in the end.

"When you are making art, it is really a lifetime career, and sometimes it's a mystery what is next," he said. "If you ask me what my next stage in my work will be, the truth is I cannot visualize what I'll do next."

Taking his role as an instructor very seriously, Shang said he tries to be 50-percent artist and 50-percent teacher since both are so important to him. He said that in some ways the ability of the instructor is reflected in the students. It is important to give students the instruction they need to improve their work while not influencing them to the point that all the students' art looks like the teacher's, he said.

"I never believed a lousy artist could become a good art teacher, but a great artist won't necessarily be a great teacher either," he said. "So, it is challenging because I want to become a great artist and also be an effective teacher."

Brent Arnold, graduate student in painting, said Shang has had more influence on him as an artist than anyone else. Arnold said he has produced his best work with Shang's criticism because he has an ability to see a student's potential and bring that out by helping them find themselves.

"I had a favorite chair that I really wanted to use in a piece, so I brought it into the studio excited and ready to work," said Arnold, graduate teaching assistant for 2-D design. "Xuhong realized I was too attached to that chair and too excited right then, so he made me hold off."

"I did a couple other pieces. Then, after I had calmed down, he said I should do the piece. I came back to it and did the piece, and it turned out to be one of my best works because he knew I needed to wait to work on it."

The influence Shang has had on Arnold began before either of them were at K-State. Shang was one of Arnold's instructors as an undergraduate at the Savannah College of Art and Design in Savannah, Ga. When Shang took the position at K-State, Arnold followed.

The K-State Department of Fine Arts was searching for a painter to hire for the vacancy that Shang filled, Teresa Schmidt, associate professor of art, said. When searching through the many applications, Schmidt said it wasn't uncommon to see strong work from the applicant, but what really sold her on Shang was his students' work.

"Xuhong has a very professional approach to teaching because of the respect he gives his students," she said. "He has a way of bringing the best work out of them while not making all their work look the same."

The way Shang uses color is effective with students, Schmidt said, because he teaches how to use mostly neutral colors to their full effects. After learning expression through varying shades of gray, students understand the full effect of each color used, she said.

This use of color is very visible in his latest works from the "Mountain Series," which are in the abstract minimal conceptual discipline, he said. In these paintings, Shang paints a mountainous landscape with oil on a black background, creating the effect of looking at a negative of traditional Chinese landscapes, which are drawn with black ink on white rice paper, he said.

White bars fragment the view to convey the impression of attempting to view a serene landscape through the obstructions of modern society, he said.

Locally, Shang has work displayed at the Columbian Theatre Museum & Art Center in Warrego and in the faculty art exhibit in the K-State Student Union.

Keeping the interest of viewers is important, so Shang teaches to keep the meaning within the painting and not to make it obvious to everyone, Arnold said. The goal is to create something that appears to reach for infinity instead of something that can be read like a billboard, so that people will take time to find meaning instead of just walking past after a glance, he said.

Ultimately, the goal of any work is to reach out to others and make them feel something, Shang said. He is attempting to convey the energy he feels through his work and teach the power that art has to express a feeling to a viewer.

"Great art always has the power to make people react to the work, whether that's in a positive or negative way," he said. "I am not trying to teach students to paint a picture, but to make art."

Non-violence campaign to educate university

By LYNNE HERMANSEN
Kansas State Collegian

A campaign for non-violence is developing to promote violence awareness and to educate the campus.

Last semester, student representatives and faculty formed a committee. They have had five meetings since September.

The idea for the campaign was recommended by Robert Krause, vice president for institutional advancement.

"This is a campaign program occurring on other campuses," said Dorinda Lambert, assistant director of University Counseling Services. "It is not only for women, but issues that also affect men."

Lambert said proactive steps will be taught to give people a better awareness of their community and different ways to handle situations.

"Sometimes women feel uncomfortable in certain situations, but men can, too," she said.

The campaign is in the developing stages. Lambert said details will be vague until an official Jan. 24 meeting. The goal of the meeting is to outline projects.

"Right now, our plans are to modify the existing environment and make improvements on things that are already occurring on campus," Lambert said.

Four work groups have been formed to help educate and assist professors, assist K-State Police or those groups who handle violence, and work with the media and coordinate the whole environment.

Lambert said she does not think the campus is a violent place.

"We want to help teach skills that are necessary for a happy, healthy environment," she said.

A goal of the campaign is to help students when they are not on campus.

"We want to help those who have difficulty managing conflict or deal with sexual violence outside campus," she said.

Susan Allen, director of the Women's Center, said some ideas for the campaign have been discussed.

"We hope in lots of different ways for this to touch every department, office and student," she said.

Additions to curricula are possible.

"Our dream part of the plan for someday in the future is to organize a curriculum for teaching and learning non-violence," Allen said.

Allen said people practice non-violence every day.

"Respect, equality, safety, community building all makes responsible citizens," she said. "It all contributes to creating a non-violent community."

Training, workshops and activist opportunities are going to help promote the campaign. Allen said a variety of posters will be posted on campus to promote the campaign.

There will be a contest to design a logo that represents the campaign. The winner will receive a prize of at least $100.

Miami vote review finds Bush gain of 6

The Associated Press

MIAMI — A review of 10,600 previously uncounted ballots in Miami-Dade County showed George W. Bush gaining six more votes than Al Gore, The Palm Beach Post reported Sunday.

The newspaper counted votes that were not registered by ballot machines, or undervotes. The count included ballots ranging from those with barely hanging chads to ones that were just slightly dimpled.

Two Post reporters, each paired with an elections staffer, reviewed the ballots.

The review concluded that President-elect Bush would have gained 251 votes and Vice President Gore would have gained 245 votes. No overvotes, or ballots where machines detected more than one presidential vote, were counted.

The review, which ended last week, also showed that 7,690 of the more than 10,000 undervotes had no mark at all in the presidential column, or in rare cases included multiple votes that could not be given to one candidate or the other.

At least 2,257 ballots were clearly but inaccurately punched in odd-numbered holes that corresponded to none of the 10 presidential candidates on the ballot. The 653,963 Miami-Dade ballots used only even-numbered holes for the presidential race.

The certified final results in Miami-Dade were 328,808 votes for Gore and 289,533 for Bush, according to the Florida secretary of state's office. Bush won Florida by a 537-vote margin out of about 6 million votes cast in the state.

Later this month, a research firm hired by a media group that includes the Post, The Associated Press and other news organizations will undertake an inspection of all roughly 180,000 undervotes and overvotes in the Florida presidential election.

The Miami Herald is working with an accounting firm to review only the estimated 60,000 undervote ballots that were rejected in the presidential race statewide.

2 inmates escape from Oklahoma prison early Monday

The Associated Press

MCALISTER, Okla. — Two inmates with a history of escapes, including a man who raped and murdered an 81-year-old neighbor, fled from the state prison early Monday.

The inmates were discovered missing from their cells in a maximum security wing of the Oklahoma State Penitentiary about 5 a.m., said Jerry Massie, a spokesman for the state Department of Corrections.

Massie identified the escapees as James Robert Thomas, 25, and Willie Lee Hoffman, 21.

Both were considered dangerous, but there was no evidence they were armed, Massie said.

They were suspected of stealing a car in the McAlester area late in the morning, said Sterling Taylor, a dispatcher for the Pittsburg County Sheriff's Office.

"They are on the road, and we don't know which way they are headed," Taylor said.

Thomas was convicted of the 1993 rape and murder of Jessie M.

Roberts, an 81-year-old neighbor who had hired him to mow her lawn. Thomas, who was 17 at the time of the slaying, was sentenced to life without chance of parole for murder, plus 400 years for rape, Massie said.

Hoffman is serving a 20-year sentence for kidnapping and other charges.

It is the first escape from the high-security area of the prison known as H Unit, which was opened in September 1991, Massie said.

Authorities did not know how the pair managed the escape, Massie said. No one was injured.

Authorities said Thomas escaped from the Oklahoma County Jail in 1994. Hoffman broke out of the Payne County Jail in 1998 and from a private prison in Cushing in 1997.

Authorities in neighboring Texas are searching for seven convicts who escaped Dec. 13 from the maximum-security Connally Unit, 60 miles southeast of San Antonio. They since have been charged with the Christmas Eve slaying of a Dallas-area police officer.

that with lack of dollars available, each has to be used to the fullest potential.

"There is only so much money to go around, and we want to do everything possible for Kansas education," Docking said. "This time of year we work heavily with the Legislature on budget proposals and additional issues as they relate to higher education."

This year, the board hopes to begin developing a master plan for the future of Kansas' education, said Carter.

"There really has not been an objective study since the board coordinated a few years ago," Carter said. "This study will provide an overall state picture and direction for the future."

Conducted by an outside firm, the statewide study will be highly credible, Blair said. With goals to start in 60 days, the study will focus on the relationships of state schools and possible partnerships to make them more efficient and more accountable, he said.

This commitment to the students has been the foundation for the board. Striving to advance knowledge, the board has visions to provide quality education for the entire state, Craig said.

"You have to know where you are to know where you want to go," Craig said. "We can meet the needs of higher education for all of Kansas. No student will be left behind who wants to get ahead."

In current issues, the heating crisis has not left schools out of feeling the crunch.

"One concern is the cost of utilities, which has risen dramatically," Docking said. "We will seek supplemental funding to offset these increases."

Cutting down on duplications within state distance education programs, Blair said he hopes to integrate and centralize distance education. Blair said he also plans to create a uniform entrance application to be used for all state schools.

BUTLER

And a good junior campaign Butler had, as he led the K-State defense with seven interceptions, tying him with C.J. Masters (1992) for second on the Cats' all-time single season charts, one behind Chris Canty's eight in 1995.

Butler also recorded 42 tackles in starting all 14 games for the Big 12 North Division Champions (11-3), and finished his career tied for fifth on K-State's all-time interceptions list with 11 picks.

Each of the 36 players granted eligibility by the NFL has been out of high school for at least three seasons while also submitting a written application in which he renounced his remaining college football eligibility. The deadline for receiving applications was Friday.

Butler said he submitted his application on New Year's Day following K-State's 35-21 victory over Tennessee in the Southwestern Bell Cotton Bowl.

However, he said he actually had reached his decision to go pro nearly a month prior to that. After consulting his family, as well as the Cat coaching staff, he said he decided to forgo his senior season after K-State lost the Dec. 2 Big 12 Championship game to Oklahoma.

"I had only told a few close friends," Butler said. "My mom and Coach Snyder were a big influence on me. It was important to my mother for me to graduate, and this way, I still have a chance to go back and get my degree. I just felt like this would be the best decision for me."

Other Big 12 players among the 36 leaving early for the draft include Nebraska center Dominic Raiola, Missouri defensive end Justin Smith, Oklahoma State tailback Reginald White, and Texas A&M wide-out Robert Ferguson and fullback Ja'Mar Toombs.

Canty was the last Wildcat to leave early for the NFL draft, declaring his eligibility following the 1996 season.

"This Week." Boxer, who has announced her intention to vote against Ashcroft, said of him: "This is an extremist, not a healer."

Most Democrats were more circumspect than that, including Leahy. He called Ashcroft a divisive choice by President-elect Bush, but disagreed with critics who have tried to paint the former Missouri senator as a racial or religious bigot.

"I think all of us who know him, know that charge would not stick," Leahy said on CNN's "Late Edition" of either allegation.

Ashcroft's confirmation hearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee, where he once was a member, begins Tuesday.

Interest groups are piling on. On Sunday, the board of the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers took what it called an unprecedented step in voting to oppose Ashcroft.

"Ashcroft's legacy on criminal justice issues is demagoguery and opportunism," Edward Mallett, the group's president, said.

On Monday, Charles Evers, brother of slain civil rights leader

Medgar Evers, sent letters of support for Ashcroft to members of the judiciary committee, saying allegations of racism against him are not supported by facts, adding that the charges "seem to me to be nothing more than a political ploy to fan the flames of racial division in our country." Evers, a former mayor of Fayette, Miss., was a Mississippi delegate to the 2000 GOP convention.

High energy costs cause $1.5 million budget recall

By CRISTINA JANNEY
Kansas State Collegian

High energy costs will mean an estimated $1.5 million budget recall for K-State this year.

The cuts are despite contracts the university had signed allowing it to purchase fuel below the market price, Faculty Senate president Mickey Ransom said.

Faculty Senate discussed the cuts at its meeting Tuesday evening.

Ransom said $1.5 million distributed throughout K-State would equal 1- to 2-percent cuts across the board.

Deans will have flexibility in making up the budget requirements. However, colleges often turn to their other operating-expense funds to meet budget recalls.

These funds cover expenses such as photocopying, office supplies, equipment purchases, faculty travel, work study and maintenance.

Although the university requested a $1.5 million budget increase for utilities for the 2002 fiscal year, it has not been recommended by Gov. Bill Graves.

A change in funding of state salaries also could affect K-State's current budget.

The governor has announced a 7.5-percent increase in entry-level pay for civil service employees.

However, he has not recommended any means of funding this change. Because the change would be an executive order, the Kansas Legislature has no discretion in this matter.

Senators discovered the budget increases for faculty salaries are accompanied by about equal cuts in the budget elsewhere.

Ransom said the cuts equaled about $8.2 million, and the recommended faculty salary increase was about $8.4 million.

The governor recommended a 3-percent salary increase for unclassified professional staff, a 2.25-percent increase for student employees and graduate teaching and research assistants. However, the Kansas Board of Regents authorized 8.2-percent increases in salaries to all three groups.

The governor also did not recommend $1.2 million in matching funds for instructional equipment, $172,000 to support the Ackert Hall addition, more than $1 million in matching funds for library support, $2.1 million in general funds plus more than $2 million in other enhancements.

"The governor made it look good," Buddy Gray, senator from the College of Arts and Sciences, said about the governor's state-of-the-state address. "He talked about the additions, but he did not talk about the cuts."

Cia Verschelden, arts and sciences senator, said the governor's support of the university was weak.

"He has robbed Peter to pay Paul," she said. "We probably took a step forward and several steps back."

Poet, writer, director and performer Samuel G. Irving impersonates Martin Luther King Jr. in his one-person play, "Keeping the Dream Alive in the New Millennium," Tuesday night in Forum Hall. Irving, who is from Chapel Hill, N.C., said he received death threats and bomb threats last year. "I experienced just a piece of what Martin Luther King Jr. went through."

Bearing his message

1-man show portrays King's contributions

By NICK BRATKOVIC
Kansas State Collegian

On a dimly lit stage with microphone in hand, Samuel Irving's portrayal of Martin Luther King Jr. went beyond the civil rights leader's "I Have a Dream" speech.

Irving used only a podium and a chair to bring King's message to life Tuesday evening as part of Martin Luther King Jr. Observance Week.

"We have all heard the 'I Have a Dream' speech," Irving said. "We need to go beyond that and get a broader concept of who he was."

In his one-hour performance, "Keeping the Dream Alive in the New Millennium," he performed a piece titled "Fun Town," which featured Irving as King talking to the audience about segregation with his daughter.

"I thought I could answer most questions, but I didn't know how to tell my 5-year-old daughter no, that she couldn't go to Fun Town because she was black," Irving said in his monologue, "because she was colored."

In the play, King gave his daughter a message of the law, but also one of belief.

"Always remember even though you can't go, you are as good as anyone who does go to Fun Town," Irving said as King.

It was a piece of the play audience members said showed another side of the civil rights leader.

"I learned a lot about Dr. King tonight," Maurice Draine, junior in marketing, said. "There was more behind all of the speeches, more of a human side."

The human side of King is an aspect Irving said he has enjoyed studying and portraying throughout his adult life.

"That is what makes 'Fun Town' my favorite piece in the program," Irving said, "because of the emotion that is involved with him talking to his daughter."

Throughout the play, Irving worked to spread pieces of King's message.

"We have a stigma about black people," Irving said while in character.

City looks at housing proposals

By SHANNON MARSHALL
Kansas State Collegian

Additional steps are being taken toward improving the foundation of Manhattan's somewhat shaky housing inspection situation.

During past months, a number of complaints have arisen, many of them from students, about the quality of rental housing in Manhattan. Recent meetings with the city's Housing Inspection Committee are beginning to shed light upon future methods of improvement.

In a meeting with the Housing Inspection Committee on Jan. 10, two proposals were presented. The first involved keeping city expenses to a minimum by using city staff members to perform housing inspections. The second included hiring independent licensed inspectors to perform the inspections.

"This is not something new," said Brad Claussen, building official for the city of Manhattan. "This is not a new code we are proposing — buildings are already supposed to meet this code. If we are proposing anything new, it is additional enforcement that will make sure these inspections are being performed."

Mayor Karen McCulloh said it is the city's principal goal to ensure the safety of Manhattan's residents.

"We need to have safe housing in Manhattan. We're not trying to point any fingers. We just want to keep our residents safe," she said.

McCulloh said it is not only the landlord's responsibility to arrange for housing inspections.

"Tenants have responsibilities, too," she said. "If residents see that no inspection has been made to their housing, then they need to make arrangements for that to be done."

Jake Worcester, student body president, is a member of the committee and an advocate of mandatory housing inspections.

"Student Senate asked the city for mandatory inspections," he said. "The city needs to move forward now, and it looks as if most of the committee itself is in favor of moving forward."

Worcester said the committee is looking at a five-year program that would require landlords to have inspections performed every five years. Under the committee's proposal, landlords would have to register their property for a total of approximately $1 per month.

"We don't want to hassle the good landlords," said Worcester. "Most of the housing in Manhattan, about 90 to 95 percent, is quality — it's safe. It's healthy. But, it's that 5 to 10 percent that we're worried about, and there's no other way to improve it but to make inspections mandatory."

McCulloh said she encourages students to attend the next meeting scheduled for 6 p.m. Feb. 13 at City Hall.

McCulloh also welcomed students to call the city at 587-4506 and ask for the Code Services Department if students have any questions about the meeting or housing concerns.

Faculty, students clash over Ashcroft hearing

By JENNIFER O'NEILL
Kansas State Collegian

The nomination of John Ashcroft for attorney general is not only a controversial move in the eyes of the people of this country, but to the students and faculty at K-State as well.

Because of the Missouri politician's political history and position on current U.S. laws, many people disagree about whether he will be effective in representing the American people.

"I think he's an interesting choice, a controversial one with his strong positions on affirmative action and abortion," John Fliter, associate professor of political science, said. "It's ironic — George W. Bush said he wants to unite not divide, but his choice is a conservatively viewed, controversial man."

Fliter said it's going to be tough for Ashcroft to convince his opponents he's the right person for the job.

"It may be difficult for him to represent all Americans," he said. "It's going to be a challenge for him to separate personal views from public responsibility."

Ashcroft has been criticized by both Democrats and Republicans for opposing abortion even in cases of rape and incest.

He also has opposed civil rights measures to give racial preferences to minorities as well as opposed the nomination of a black Missouri Supreme Court justice to the federal bench in 1999. This latest move has drawn significant criticism from civil rights groups.

At the Senate hearings, Ashcroft will face questions that focus on his stance on issues like voting rights, school desegregation, gun control and affirmative action.

Linda Richter, professor of political science, said she agrees with Fliter in the sense of the position being a challenge for Ashcroft, one that she thinks he's not up to.

"I think it was imprudent in the sense that President-elect Bush has such a narrow margin and mandate that he should have selected someone less controversial," she said.

"He's not smart to have all these battles before he's even inaugurated."

People who are against Ashcroft say they aren't necessarily afraid of him not enforcing the laws, but they fear he will use his position to advocate personal views.

"The attorney general is bound to enforce the laws, so in that sense I'm not particularly worried, but how he enforces it could be a problem," Richter said. "Given his opposition to gun control and abortion,

Highway Patrol trooper found shot in patrol car

PRATT, Kan. — A Kansas Highway Patrol trooper was found shot in his patrol car at a community college Monday night, the patrol said.

The trooper was flown to a Wichita hospital where he was in critical condition, said Sgt. Gary Warner.

The trooper was found shot twice in the neck shortly after 7 p.m., sitting in his car in a parking lot on the Pratt County Community College campus, said Lt. Phil Bostian.

He was identified as Lt. Tom Quinn of Ellinwood, a supervisor for troopers in the region, by the Great Bend Tribune and Pratt Tribune newspapers.

Bostian said a man found the trooper slumped over the wheel, still strapped in with his seat belt.

Authorities were trying to figure out what the trooper had been doing at the time of the shooting.

He had not radioed in to say he was stopping a car, Bostian said.

Warner said authorities were still investigating the shooting and did not have a suspect.

Lesion from Clinton tests positive for skin cancer

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The growth removed from President Clinton's back last week has tested positive for skin cancer, the White House said Tuesday.

White House press secretary Jake Siewert said pathology results confirmed the diagnosis of basal cell carcinoma. The flat lesion was discovered at a Jan. 12 physical at Bethesda Naval Hospital in suburban Maryland.

"This is a relatively common form of skin cancer, 800,000 to 1 million cases a year," Siewert said. "The lesion was removed, so while the president, it can be said, had skin cancer, that has been removed and he no longer has it."

When doctors removed the lesion, the tissue around it also was treated with a "scraping and burning" technique, a common procedure, Siewert said.

He said pathologists noted that the entire lesion was removed and that the possibility of recurrence is low.

Clinton will have a follow-up visit with the dermatologist in six months, Siewert said.

"If there's no evidence of new lesions at that time, it will be followed up on an annual basis," he said.

After the exam, Dr. David Corbett, retired chairman of the hospital's dermatology department, said Clinton has had "sun-damage spots" before, but this is the first time such spots raised suspicions of skin cancer.

Basal cell carcinoma is the most curable form of skin cancer. It is a slow-growing cancer usually confined to the surface of skin — thus doctors almost always can remove it all with a shallow incision.

The sun-caused tumors usually begin as a small, waxlike nodule on the skin, sometimes looking like pearly white scars. They also can form scabs that alternately bleed and heal.

Besides the skin cancer and a slightly elevated cholesterol level, doctors pronounced Clinton in good health as he prepares to leave the White House.

Motorola plans layoffs for cellular phone factory

CHICAGO — Hoping to boost sagging profits, wireless giant Motorola Inc. said Monday that it will stop making cellular phones at one of its factories and lay off about 2,500 plant employees.

The jobs being cut in Harvard, Ill., represent nearly 2 percent of Motorola's work force of 130,000. About 2,500 employees will remain at the factory 60 miles northwest of Chicago.

The focus at the facility will instead be on fulfilling customer orders and new product sourcing, the company said. Cell phone production will end by June 30.

Motorola, also a leading semiconductor manufacturer, has pledged more cost-cutting measures in 2001 to try to revive its slumping cell phone business.

Getting new phones to market quickly has been a consistent problem for Motorola, which was overtaken by Nokia in 1999 as the world's No. 1 cell-phone manufacturer and has fallen further behind.

The production shutdown continues a restructuring that began under Motorola chief executive Christopher Galvin two years ago and accelerated in the second half of 2000, during a slump in phone profits.

The company announced six weeks ago that it would pay

Age, parents' income affect aid, tax status

By LYNNE HERMANSEN
Kansas State Collegian

Winter brings snowflakes, hot chocolate and, for many, the dreaded tax and financial aid forms.

When filling out tax forms, students can declare themselves as either independent or dependent.

Larry Moeder, director of student financial assistance, said that by financial aid regulations students have to meet certain criteria to be able to declare themselves independent.

"A student cannot be independent unless they are at least 24 years of age, or a graduate student, or orphan, or ward of the court," he said. "Otherwise, the government views the student as dependent."

Moeder said if a student is independent, it is not required to view their parents' income.

"There is this misunderstanding that independent students receive more financial aid than dependent students, but it all depends on parents' income or lack thereof," he said.

Moeder said if parents' income is low enough, the student could be just as eligible to be dependent.

"It is also almost impossible to say parents' income is too high," he said. "Every single student can qualify for student aid, but depending on parents' income, they may only be eligible for a student loan. It is a misconception that if parents make a high enough income, the student does not qualify for student aid. Aid varies, but it is available."

Moeder said other factors are looked at besides parents' income.

"Years ago we had a student here, and their parents made $80,000. This seems like a good amount, but they

"There is this misunderstanding that independent students receive more financial aid than dependent students, but it all depends on parents' income or lack thereof."

— Larry Moeder, director of student financial assistance were also providing for eight children with this income, and six of them were in college," he said.

Moeder said advantages and disadvantages all depend on these certain situations.

"There will probably always be the misconception of independent students receiving more money, but it really all depends on each student's unique situation."

When it comes to filling out their tax forms, some students depend on the help of their parents.

"My parents fill it out for me, because I do not know how to fill it out myself," said Erica Tabares, sophomore in family studies and community services.

Tabares' parents claim her as a dependent, but she feels being an independent would be more beneficial for her college career.

"I think I would receive more financial support in the way of loans and grants because the school would see how poor I was," Tabares said, "especially without parental support."

Sarah Hanzlick, sophomore in physics, said her father takes care of tax forms for her.

"He has always handled the family finances, so I do not worry about tax forms much," she said

HOLLYWOOD STYLE

Mother of 2 balances waitressing job, family, college

By LUCAS SHIVERS
Kansas State Collegian

Pulled into the profession seven years ago by her sister, Mary King has learned to juggle not only tables, but also life as a student and single parent.

"I thought waitressing would be kind of fun," King said. "I guess I fit the typical Hollywood image of working to support my family and education."

Employed at Bob's Diner since January 1994, she said waitressing is not always as easy as it appears in the movies.

"It is a lot of work, but I like what I do, and I am able to make some money," she said. "There are few other people who enjoy the job as much as I do."

King said the laid-back atmosphere of the diner complements her personal character.

"Bob's is relaxed and friendly," she said. "It's original, old fashioned and not stripped like chain restaurants. The people know you, and you know the regulars by name."

Typically managing the early morning shift, she said the same people surround her day after day. Labeled as "the morning guys," King said the patrons of the diner are some of her favorite customers.

"It's almost like having a bunch of parents to look after you," she said. "We joke around and get crazy at times. They care about me, and it shows."

When some of the guys went to Las Vegas a few years ago, they gambled in King's name and won some money for her, she said.

One morning, they even had a baby shower after Elizabeth, now two months old, was born.

King's children, Elizabeth and Anthony, 7, are viewed as her greatest accomplishments. Raising them alone has been a struggle at times, she said.

"It has been a new experience with the baby," she said. "I'm starting all over with another kid, but she's a blessing. I'm not sure how I handle it all, but somehow we manage."

King credits her strong work ethic to her ability in handling the different areas of her life. Motivated by people, King challenges herself to talk, joke or tease anyone out of a grumpy mood.

"I try to find one person a day to cheer up," she said. "They do the same for me when I need it."

Kansas Steakhouse, worked with King four years ago at the diner. Luppo said King's natural talent with people was impressive.

"She was really good with people," Luppo said. "She was happy to see them, and they were happy to see her. She could relate to many of the regulars, both college kids and the older generations."

Bob Jacobellis, owner of the diner, said King has been an asset.

"It has been a privilege to work with Mary over the years," he said. "She cares for everyone and is committed to her responsibilities on the job, as well as with her kids and school."

Jacobellis said her personality stands out with unmatched strength. He said King has been in many situations, both at work and with her family, that would cause anyone else to fold under the pressure; however, King shines in these times.

"I'm not a quitter, and I never give up," King said. "If my heart is in it, I'll fight tooth and nail. Independence is my strongest trait, and it has to keep going."

A sophomore in accounting, King said her education is an example of her perseverance.

"I just liked numbers, and I figured math was a good way to go," she said. "I can't be a waitress forever, but until I graduate and find a job with weekends off, I will continue to strive to do my part."

High utility bills require effort from students

Students usually count on their loan checks to help pay for a variety of things, such as rent, food and entertainment. But this semester some students might be counting on a portion of those checks to do something a little more unusual — pay for their gas bills.

The natural gas prices have increased dramatically since this time last year. For students on a limited income this can be, and ultimately is, a huge burden.

Part of the problem of the increased gas bill is related to the poor housing conditions in parts of Manhattan.

A large portion of the houses in Manhattan are probably not insulated like they should be. This allows cooler air to get in, thus heaters need to be turned up.

Students need to take a pro-active stance in dealing with their high bills. If they live with roommates, they need to determine a comfortable living arrangement.

However, while a low thermostat reading seems to be optimal, it is important that the heat is not turned completely off or too low because pipes can freeze when this occurs, and it costs more to reheat an area than to maintain an even temperature.

Another step that students need to take is talking to their landlords. They need to make sure their thermostats have been changed every decade. Some landlords also offer tips to keep bills down.

Students can even take this a step further and write KPL Gas Services a letter concerning the increases.

Question for Thursday: Controversial attorney general nominee John Ashcroft is undergoing Senate confirmations this week. What do you think of President-elect Bush's choice?

pre-conceived NOTIONS

Bad apples spoil image of students from Johnson County

There's one thing I've come to absolutely dread about this university. It's going to sound really trivial when I tell you what it is, but just bear with me.

I can't stand to introduce myself to people anymore. It's not that I don't like meeting new people because I would love to meet everyone on this campus. I think that's probably humanly impossible.

What I hate about introducing myself to people in Manhattan is telling them where I'm from.

As soon as the words "Johnson County" escape my lips I automatically get that scornful look of contempt from people who aren't from the Kansas City area.

I hate for people to judge me because of their preconceived notions of what all people from Johnson County are like. We all know that it's wrong to judge a person by the color of their skin, so why would you commit the same wrongdoing and judge a person by the county they come from?

So in an effort to ease my apprehension for the next time I have to introduce myself to someone, I'm going to set all of the Johnson County haters straight by debunking a few popular myths.

Johnson County Myth No. 1: Everyone in Johnson County drives either an SUV or something expensive and foreign.

I really wish having the Johnson County birthright entitled me to have a brand new Mercedes. My '93 Grand Am with mileage in the six-figure range isn't exactly a sparkling new luxury vehicle. Very few people get brand new cars as their first cars. My first car was a '91 Escort that had been wrecked and flipped on its side before we bought it. Let's just say that it was quite the piece ... of automotive engineering.

Johnson County Myth No. 2: Everyone from Johnson

County has a cellular phone.

OK, I will admit a lot of people from Johnson County do have cell phones, but I think this campus has an unusually high rate of cell-phone users. It's not just the people from Johnson County who whip out the cell phones at parties or while in line at Victoria's Secret or the Gap. Many people have cell phones for convenience and safety reasons regardless of where they're from.

Johnson County Myth No. 3: Mommy and Daddy pay for everything.

Yeah right. Maybe for a select few, but many students from Johnson County are making ends meet thanks to that glorious thing called a financial aid refund. Some people's parents actually refuse to pay their offspring's debts because they're trying to teach them lessons in financial responsibility. Imagine that.

Johnson County Myth No. 4: Everyone from Johnson County is a snob.

Believe it or not, we don't think we're better than you because of our geographical birthright. True snobbery is falsely judging someone because of his or her hometown. Unless you want to be considered a snob yourself, you should take time to get to know people before you jump to conclusions about their personality.

I know plenty of people from small towns that can be just as uppity and pretentious as people from Johnson County. A person's attitude toward others isn't determined by their place of origin but rather by more deep-seated personality characteristics such as compassion (or lack thereof), humility and a multitude of other traits.

Some people do take advantage of the fact that they were born into an area ripe with wealth and privilege. These are the people who foster and perpetuate the Johnson County stereotypes. Keep in mind though, not all residents of Johnson County are like those few bad apples.

Ideas from past contain promise for solutions today

Dec. 9, 2000

Sitting quietly on the steps of Seaton Hall, I rested. Soaking up sunlight, my eyes closed, surrendering to the blinding glare.

Prevailing cigarette smoke occupied the air. Above me, pigeons kept my position in their line of fire. The wind was strangely absent and fallen leaves lay silent. Snow crunched underfoot of the occasional passerby.

With my eyes closed, I couldn't guess what was about to happen.

The force gripped me. Tearing sensations began as I was synthesized.

All of my quarks, geons, protons, and electrons, the matter comprising my body, were converted to pure energy and warped.

Light bent around me as I was analyzed and reconstructed.

There was no landing, but instantly the darkness enveloped me.

My derriere remained on the same cold steps, but instead of facing the newly renovated K-State Student Union, I viewed a lawn area.

The Union had disappeared, and no Ramada stood in the distance.

A loud cheering crowd erupted to my right. The chill in the air quickened my pace as I headed toward the roar coming from Mike Ahearn Field House.

"Great," I thought, "A volleyball game. I can ask someone what the hell happened to the Union."

I ran past a man smoking outside and searched my pockets for my student ID. As I looked up, the ticket lady peered back queerly. As I glanced down at my 2001 attire, she instantly asked, "Is that one of those newfangled Wampus Cats outfits? Are you boys doing a skit or something?"

I nodded, "I'm dressing as the Gap ghost of Christmas future."

"Well, hurry on in," she said as she pointed at the court, "they're about to tip-off."

A sense of purpose rushed over me as I sprinted inside.

Dec. 9, 1950

"Ladies and gentlemen, boys and girls, welcome to Ahearn Field House," the loudspeaker bellowed, "where tonight 11,000 folks are on hand to fill what will be completed as the fifth-largest arena in the nation."

I glanced at a young boy holding a newspaper. The headline read, "$2,000,000 jewel of K-State opens tonight."

The 9-year-old boy stared deep into my eyes, almost mystically. "Willie" was stitched in purple on his jacket.

"You're here for a reason. Once you understand that reason, you will return from where you came. You may ask me many questions, as I know every answer. But once you understand, you will be sent back to the future."

"But what am I here to learn?" I pondered. Curiosity might have killed the cat, but I knew it would get me back to 21st century.

As the Cat hoopsters clawed with Utah State, I listened intently, trying to glean the information I needed.

Willie's testimony unfolded like a list.

W: "Many of the names that grace buildings in 2001 are alive and in the flesh including Lafene, Seaton, Durland, Moore, Ford, West, Throckmorton, Weber, Shellenberger, Call, Leasure, and Ackert. See that man over there? That's Assistant Dean of Arts and Sciences Chester E. Peters. Would you like to meet the namesake of your Rec complex?"

Z: "Sure," I replied. But I had a feeling that even meeting KSU president James McCain wouldn't be the reason I was here.

W: "K-State will be using new IBM machines for the first time in the spring to report grades."

Z: "Wow!" I thought, "how did they ever survive without computers?"

W: "Porter Butts, expert on college unions, is here to plan a K-State Student Union."

Z: "Duh!" I thought, "the Union hasn't even been built yet, that's why it was gone."

W: "After excessive absences, students are now dropped from a class and have an 'F' recorded."

Z: "Ouch, baby, very ouch," I thought, "That would keep people in class!"

W: "170 young ladies participated in sorority rush, and this is the last year freshman pledges will live in house."

Z: "Yeah, in 2001, we had enough in recruitment week to almost completely fill Ford Hall."

W: "What's Ford Hall?"

Z: "Oh, I forgot. Ford Hall won't be built for another 10 years or so."

W: "There is only one on-campus residence hall, Van Zile, but sister halls should be completed soon."

Z: "So where does everyone live?"

W: "Off campus organized housing is big. The largest, Syconia, has 32 men living at 1623 Fairchild."

Z: "Wow, I'll have to go check all those out. What's Student Governing Association do around here?"

W: "The Student Council keeps the student body interested, because they get to vote on two all-student holidays per year."

Z: "That's an awesome way to keep people interested in what SGA does. Surely voter turnout would increase, if we let SGA let out school one day per semester."

W: "Well, word has it that the fall let-out day will be after we win this basketball game."

Before I could respond, I felt the tearing sensation again. In a flash, I was back to the future.

I had learned for what I had been sent. Ideas from 50 years ago would still work today.

I wanted to think some more, but I was hungry. I headed into the Union to grab some grub at the food court.

Congolese president dead following coup attempt

By ARNAUD ZAJTMAN
The Associated Press

KINSHASA, Congo — President Laurent Kabila, the ruler of this vast and troubled nation, died Tuesday after being shot, his U.S. spokesman said. The shooting came during a coup attempt, Congo officials said.

"He's died," said John Aycoth, a lobbyist and public relations consultant who acts as Kabila's spokesman in the United States.

Aycoth, speaking by telephone from Durham, N.C., said he had spoken to top level Congolese officials in Kinshasa, who had confirmed Kabila's death. He said the Congolese government would make an announcement on what had happened at 6 a.m. Wednesday Congo time (midnight Tuesday EST).

French and Belgian foreign ministry officials quoted local sources as saying they believed he died of his injuries following the half-hour firefight at the presidential palace here.

Belgium is Congo's former colonial ruler and retains close ties with the nation, formerly named Zaire.

"From three sources, I have that Kabila has most likely been shot to death," Belgian Foreign Affairs Minister Louis Michel said in Brussels following a crisis meeting with the Cabinet.

Earlier, his spokesman, Koen Vervaeke, said, "He has probably been shot by one of his guards."

Intelligence officers in Rwanda also said they had unconfirmed reports that Kabila had been killed. Rwanda supports rebels who have been fighting to topple the Congolese strongman for more than two years.

The Congolese government, however, refused to elaborate publicly on the president's condition — or even whether he'd been shot.

"President Kabila is alive and everything is OK," Congolese Gen. Francois Olenga said.

A member of Kabila's security entourage said on condition of anonymity that the bodyguard had shot the president, but that Kabila was alive and being treated by doctors.

The conflicting reports came hours after witnesses described gunfire around the home of Kabila, who has been fighting multiple rebel armies since 1998. It was unclear who was responsible for the shooting.

"We don't whiteball people, we blackball people. We don't whitemail people, we blackmail people."

The play also highlighted King's visit to a program titled "Music That Made America Great."

"They were standing singing music that made America great, and there was not one black spiritual," Irving said during the play. "I sat there and all but wept inside."

It was another part of the human side that audience members said they enjoyed in the performance.

Irving, whose mother walked on Washington, D.C., to hear King speak when she was pregnant with him, said he has been perfecting the performance for a long time.

While segregation issues might have passed, Irving said financial issues confront society today.

"The economy — it's all about the money," he said. "We are past religion."

Irving said he encourages student groups to become active on their campus.

"I want to see more active students and people who are willing to make strides," Irving said.

and the rest of his political background, he may recommend appointments and federal judgeships that are not of the public mainstream."

Richter said Ashcroft might not be popular among some of the students because of his stance on abortion.

"Even students who are pro-life think women should be able to have abortions in the case of rape and incest," she said.

Richter also said she finds the whole situation with the Senate hearings fascinating.

"Ashcroft was one of their own, and I think if he would've been appointed to any other Cabinet position, there wouldn't be this much controversy because his own views wouldn't come into play," she said. Richter does admit that overall she finds Ashcroft to be a confident, serious and decent man.

Not everyone at K-State is in opposition to President-elect Bush's choice.

Some say Ashcroft is the best person for the job and that all of the speculation before the hearings even began is unjustified.

"I think he'd make a good attorney general," said Laurie Bagby, associate professor of political science. "He has a lot of experience and a good mind."

Bagby said she doesn't think his political record is necessarily a bad one.

"I think people are more afraid that he isn't going to apply the law but he'll advocate change for the law," she said. "I don't think there's anything wrong with advocating — people are forgetting the channels of the democratic process that changing a law has to go through."

Travis Lenkner, Student Senate chair, said he agrees that people opposed to Ashcroft are forgetting one main thing.

"People think, as attorney general, Ashcroft will have all this power and be able to further his own agenda, but we're forgetting the hurdles that he'll have to jump," he said. "There are a system of checks and balances in this country, and he's a member of the president's Cabinet."

Lenkner thinks all of the speculation before the hearing process began got out of hand.

"From the way the election played out, it made people eager to challenge this administration from day one," he said. "I think people just needed to pick a target, and he's it."

Most members of the new Cabinet have been well received, but since Ashcroft is the most conservative, he was chosen as the target of controversy, Jake Worcester, Student Body President, said.

"I think he'll be confirmed and once he's gotten a chance to answer questions, people can judge him for what he says rather than on what others are saying," he said.

TIGER TROUNCING

MIKE SHEPHERD/Collegian

K-State's Kelvin Howell knocks away a rebound attempt by Missouri's T. J. Soyoye in the first half Tuesday.

Cats triumph over ranked Mizzou team

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

Sometimes teams get a lucky hot hand and sneak past a superior opponent. Sometimes, however, the underdog just outshoots, outrebounds, outdefends and outthrusts a good team, which is exactly what K-State's men's basketball team did to No. 20 Missouri in its 80-59 win Tuesday night.

"It was a great effort tonight by our team," head coach Jim Wooldridge said. "It was the only kind of effort that we could have given to beat as good a team as Missouri is."

"I think everybody roots for an underdog, and I think the underdog really came through tonight."

If one judged Missouri only by its play and ignored the high ranking, however, it would be the Tigers who looked like underdogs. K-State grabbed the opening tip and one minute later scored the first basket of the game. That was the closest Missouri would get to the Cats, who quickly ran the score to 16-3.

Using momentum built from the quick lead, the Cats' game began to excel in every facet of the game.

"I think it helped in every area," Wooldridge said. "It helped us rebound, it helped us score the ball, it helped us defend better and it helped to just keep us energized on both ends of the floor."

As a result, the Cats' confidence soared. "We felt that if we were up 16-3, we had a chance. We were going to be there at the end," guard Phineas Atchison said.

Any doubt as to whether K-State would have a chance to win, however, was erased after it finished the first half leading 38-16. Missouri was kept to just 20 percent shooting, and the Cats already had two players, Atchison and forward Matt Siebrandt, in double figures.

The Tigers' most potent offensive weapon, Kareem Rush, on the other hand, had zero points. Clarence Gilbert, who was averaging 18 points a game, had two points.

"We were just helping any time Rush got the ball in the open floor, making another person take a shot besides him and Gilbert," point guard Larry Reid said.

The second half was more of the same for K-State. Leading by 22 points, the Cats could have relaxed but instead maintained their intensity and momentum, Reid said.

"We just wanted to keep focused and keep on doing the things we were doing. We didn't want to let up and think that we had the game won in the first half," he said. "We just wanted to come out with the same intensity we had in the first half and take it to the second half."

In the second half, K-State would put together a total defensive effort and keep Missouri to just 29.9 percent shooting for the game.

"Defensively, we've put some first half efforts together in a lot of games this year, then didn't have enough firepower to finish it," Wooldridge said. "But tonight, we did."

Of course, preventing Missouri from making a comeback was made easier by the enthusiasm of 7,116 fans at the game, Siebrandt said.

"When the students get rocking, it gets us going, too. We just went on runs and runs, and it was all because of them," he said. "You get that adrenaline going, and the sky's the limit for what your team can do when the crowd's behind you."

The sky might be the limit, but K-State still hasn't consistently proved it can play well every night, Wooldridge said.

"We're not a great team. No one said we were a top-20 team. We're not," he said, "but we do have a gear in us that if we can find that gear, if we can find confidence, if we continue to try to get better, then we can be competitive. That's what we saw tonight."

Junior transfer leads K-State offensive game with 20 points

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

Two and a half minutes into Tuesday night's game with Missouri, forward Matt Siebrandt said he knew it was his night.

After taking the ball deep in the post, the junior turned and flipped a left-hander off the glass as he was hit hard by Tiger center Arthur Johnson.

And it went in. "I said, 'We need to get it down low — I can take these guys,'" Siebrandt said he said to his teammates in the huddle after the play. "So, I knew right from the get-go. After I made the first couple of buckets, I had some confidence and I knew it was going to be my night."

His night it was, as the transfer poured in a game-high 20 points to lead the Cats. The entire offense followed suit in K-State's 80-59 win over No. 20 Missouri, with four players scoring in double figures.

Despite the Tigers averaging nearly 20 points per game more than K-State on the season, it was the Cats who were on fire from the field.

K-State shot 55 percent from the floor, including 59 percent in the second half, to avenge its recent offensive woes. In the Wildcats' past two outings, the team struggled with less than 37-percent shooting in losses to Baylor and Texas.

Guard Phineas Atchison said it was a big relief to make such a turnaround on the offensive end.

"I can't really explain it — our intensity level was so high, and we just stuck with it," he said after the game. "The offense was there for us in every situation. We were able to move the ball around the perimeter, get open shots, and Matt showed up big time in the post tonight."

Head coach Jim Wooldridge said his team needed a big game out of Siebrandt inside.

"When we get 20 points out of our post player, it makes it easier for everybody," he said. "It produces points for our team."

"And I guess the point again I'm making is that we've been looking every game for someone that can be reliable in that department as an offensive player — a playmaker — and tonight we had several of them. As it turned out, a lot of players stepped up."

As a result, Siebrandt said K-State's offense might have quieted some of its critics with a sizable win over the ranked Tigers.

"Everybody's been saying how we can't put any points on the board," he said, "and I think we proved them wrong tonight."

Nevertheless, Wooldridge said he knows his team cannot expect an offensive outburst like it had against Mizzou to happen every game.

"It's great we scored some points," he said, "but we're never out of the woods in that department."

Women's team to face Longhorns

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

When K-State takes the floor tonight against Texas at Bramlage Coliseum, the Wildcats will be facing more than just the Longhorns (14-4, 2-2).

Deb Patterson's squad also will be battling the school's worst conference start of all time, dropping four straight Big 12 games, including Saturday's loss to Kansas in which the Cats (10-5, 0-4) turned the ball over a season-high 29 times.

Turnovers against a fast-scoring Texas team could spell disaster for K-State, and Patterson said the cure for that is taking care of the ball on the perimeter.

"We need to improve in taking care of the basketball," she said, "and that comes down to individual responsibility with our guards. You're going to have to play smart and protect the basketball in order to be competitive against them."

If the Cats succeed in solving their recent turnover woes, the game could come down to the battle in the paint.

Two of the Big 12's most exciting newcomers of the year, K-State's Nicole Ohlde and Texas freshman Stacy Stephens, will fight for position all night in the post, and although Ohlde has a slight size advantage, she isn't taking anything for granted.

"She's a great player," Ohlde said. "She's not the tallest post player, but she rebounds really well, and she's a great scorer."

Patterson would like all of K-State's post players to establish themselves early as a rebounding presence against a Texas team that ranks second in the Big 12 with 44.2 boards per game.

"It's real important for us to establish ourselves on the boards because Texas is a team that scores a great deal off of both offensive and defensive rebounds," she said.

Facing a possible 0-5 conference start, senior guard Kim Woodlee put the season into perspective.

"I think we just have to be sure of ourselves now," she said. "We have the players we need, the offense we need and the defense we need. Now we just need to do it."

Faculty members display artwork in new exhibit

By JJ DUNCAN
Kansas State Collegian

The diversity of the art inhabiting the new faculty exhibit in the Union art gallery is the result of the diverse artists who created it, but upon closer inspection, none of these artists are new to the university.

The art exhibit not only gives students a chance to experience artwork that is new to them, but it also gives faculty artists a chance to display art for students who might not otherwise see their work. Art students are able to see their instructors are staying in practice, James Munce, professor of art, said.

"When I was a student, I was always wondering what my instructors were doing artistically," he said. "This lets the students see that their instructors aren't just goofing off. They are still working."

The Union Program Council's Arts Committee often does selections for the gallery. But this show was determined by the faculty members whose work appears in the show. It is nice to see the faculty share their talents with the students, said Gina Kimble, interim program adviser for UPC.

"Students have a chance to see how creative and imaginative their instructors can be," she said. "The exhibit is wonderful, and I'm glad we could show it in the newly renovated gallery."

Renovation of the gallery took place over the holidays. The more open feel of the gallery makes it 100 percent better for the art displayed, Munce said.

One of Munce's prints, "Touching up the Fresco," appears in the show. It is the second print in the series of 12, titled, "St. Francis Restores the Neglected Church." The color print, done in intaglio, required three etched copper plates in yellow, red and dark blue, Munce said.

Munce said he hopes students will be able to see an example of what he tells them to do in his class in the print but he feels the art was more to be enjoyed than anything else.

"It's not necessarily something to talk about, it's something to look at," he said.

A work by Teresa Schmidt, which she said is three different etchings of her roommate, appears in the show.

Common scenes interest Schmidt and she was inspired to do this piece just seeing her roommate sitting in front of the television, she said.

Understanding where instructors are coming from can be important, and Schmidt said she hopes the exhibit gives students a glimpse of whom they are working with. Still, it is only a glimpse and doesn't tell the whole story behind each artist, she said.

"One piece from each faculty member can't possibly represent all the work they are doing," Schmidt said. "These members are showing all over the states and Europe as well. I've found as I've visited other campuses' art departments that we are incredibly fortunate to have such a talented staff."

Karen Lauseng, art instructor, displays her sterling, copper and wood artwork at the K-State Student Union faculty art exhibit.

A mixed media construction by Gary Woodward hangs on the wall as part of the K-State Student Union's faculty art exhibit.

Elliot Pujol's untitled copper and enamel artwork, front, and "Embers," also copper and enamel, are two of the pieces of faculty art on display at the K-State Student Union.

Lynda Andrus' "Grandma's Chicken with Asian Influence" is on display as part of the faculty art exhibit at the K-State Student Union.

Wamego play showcases life of Marilyn Monroe

By JJ DUNCAN
Kansas State Collegian

The blonde bombshell who graced the cover of the first issue of Playboy and set America on fire in the 1950s and '60s will grace the stage of the Columbian Theatre in Wamego this weekend, in spirit at least.

The one-person show, "Cocktails with Marilyn," is the biographical story of Marilyn Monroe's rise to stardom and her decline into drugs and depression as seen through the eyes of Monroe herself. The play itself gives a good sense of who Monroe was beyond the image of the dumb blonde because of the vast amount of information it gives about her, director Karen Hastings said.

"I think this play will give people a totally different viewpoint about Marilyn and who she was," she said. "She was just regarded as a sex symbol and nothing else, but she really was an incredible performer."

Christi Moore takes on the weighty role of Monroe in the production. The role is challenging not only because there is no one else on stage to depend on, but also because it is completely up to her to convey the image, attitude and persona of Monroe, she said.

"I feel pressure because I have to capture her entire persona, from her voice to her image, and it's hard to become her," she said. "And anytime you play a real person, you put part of yourself into that as well."

Anyone who goes to the show who isn't a Monroe fan might not leave liking her, but at least they will know something more about her and have a better understanding of her, said Scott Kickhafer, general director of the Columbian Theatre. It is difficult for a generation after Monroe's time to understand the impact she had on America, but the play gives a closer look for those who weren't there, Kickhafer said.

"This gives you some of the performances, some of the insight and basically, a taste of Marilyn," he said. "And for those who don't know anything about her, it's a great history lesson."

"Cocktails with Marilyn" is meant to express how Monroe felt and what she thought on her last night alive, Moore said. Moore said she is a fan of Monroe, so the part took special meaning for her and she takes pride in being given the opportunity to express the turmoil and beauty of Monroe.

The strong persona of Monroe that comes through in the play also attracted Hastings to the script. When first offered the opportunity to direct at the Columbian, Hastings said she had been particularly busy, so she needed some incentive from Kickhafer.

Scott called and asked if I would be interested in directing a play after Christmas, and I said not a chance," Hastings said. "He asked me just to read the script, so I said 'Sure.' So I read it and I called back and said yeah, I'd wanted to direct it." Monroe's courage and kindness attracted Hastings, who said she saw most of Monroe's movies as research for the play. Hastings said she hopes the play will give people the chance to experience Monroe as a real person through the turmoil in her mind. If nothing else, it has peaked her own interest, Hastings said.

"I had a totally different perspective of Marilyn before I did the play," she said. "I didn't dislike her, but I just wasn't enthralled. Well, I am now."

Faulty wiring cause of fire at Pike house

By JESSICA PITTS

Kansas State Collegian

A fire broke out Wednesday night at Pi Kappa Alpha fraternity, 2021 College View Road, leaving 70 fraternity members homeless for the night.

"We are staying at neighboring fraternities or friends' houses tonight," Justin Myers, president of Pike, said. "We will have to re-evaluate the situation tomorrow to know about future living situations."

The fire sounded alarms at approximately 7 p.m., and was caused by faulty wiring, said Pete Heptig, battalion chief for the Manhattan Fire Department.

"A space heater was connected to an outlet that had bad wiring," Heptig said. "The space heater overheated and ignited materials on a shelf above the heater."

The fire was localized to a single room in the bottom right wing of the house. The rest of the house suffered minimal smoke damage.

"The residents are choosing not to stay here on their own discretion because of the smoke smell, but the house is livable," Heptig said.

No one was seriously injured in the fire; however, one member suffered minimal smoke inhalation and was treated and released at the scene by Riley County EMS, Heptig said.

Myers said the fraternity followed the practiced routine for fires and that all members were out of the house in less than five minutes.

"We had just finished with chapter, and when the members heard the alarms, we moved quickly," he said.

Members were allowed to enter the house to get overnight necessities, but Myers said he decided no one was allowed to stay.

LIVING history

King's 1968 campus visit still remembered

By MICHELLE BERTUGLIA

Kansas State Collegian

Martin Luther King Jr. forever will be intertwined into K-State history.

At 10 a.m. Jan. 19, 1968, just 2 1/2 months before he was assassinated, King spoke to a crowd of more than 7,000 people in Ahearn Field House.

His speech, "The Future of Integration," eloquently addressed the distance that still needed to be forged in narrowing the racial divide of the day.

Natacha Phelps, junior in accounting, said she first learned of King's visit Monday. For her, knowing this piece of history enhances the meaning of Martin Luther King Jr. Week.

"It makes it seem like Manhattan was more a part of what was happening at the time," Phelps said. "It helps make the holiday more tied with our history."

Betsy Bergen, professor of family studies and human services, said she went to the convocation in 1968. Bergen likened seeing King at that time to seeing any famous person today. She said that throughout her tenure at K-State, she always has made it a habit to go to important lectures.

"I remember seeing and listening to him," Bergen said. "At the time, it was more like going to see any famous person."

Bergen said the significance of the lecture did not hit home with her until nearly a decade later.

"Now, I look back and see what a huge leader he was and can see all of the differences he made in the world," Bergen said. "We did not see the significance of his speaking at K-State until later."

Although having a speaker like King come to K-State might seem like a momentous event for students today, Tom Palmer, the Collegian staff member who covered King's speech and now writes for the Boston Globe, said he did not remember covering King's speech.

"I remember well the day a few months later in the Collegian news room, and I heard of the assassination of Martin Luther King," Palmer said.

"I don't remember covering that speech," Palmer said King's speech was just one of many phenomenal speeches given that year at K-State.

"Dr. King was a strong voice at the time. His visit to K-State was one of many in the civil rights community," Palmer said. "Since his death, a new appreciation of what he stood for has grown with his memory."

K-State was not the same place when King visited as it is today. Black residents were not allowed to live in certain parts of Manhattan, and black students could not pledge fraternities or sororities.

Bergen said there was definite racial tension on campus at that time.

"America has failed to hear the plight of the Negro, and he is calling for attention. As long as justice is postponed, we will be on the verge of social disruption."

— Kansas State Collegian,
Jan. 19, 1968

"...And there is another myth that is disseminated a great deal. It is the notion that legislation has no role to play in establishing justice and in moving toward an integrated society."

"...There comes a time when one must take a position that is neither safe, nor politic, nor popular."

"...Through such maladjustment, we will be able to emerge from the bleak and desolate midnight of man's inhumanity to man, to the bright and glittering daybreak of freedom and justice..."

"Free at last! Free at last! Thank God almighty! We are free at last!"

— excerpts of Martin Luther King Jr.'s speech Jan. 19, 1968, at Ahearn Field House are courtesy of University Archives.

Campbell's restaurant opens today

By NANCY HULL

Kansas State Collegian

Fifty-one flavors of Campbell's restaurant soup and chili are coming to the K-State Student Union.

Campbell's will open in Union Station today in place of Sbarro's Pizzeria, which closed last spring. The new venue will feature six different soups each day to rotate the 51 varieties.

Salad and two types of bread will be available in addition to soup. Two kinds of Campbell's soup will be served in the Union Food Court daily, and the Food Court's satellite carts in Hale Library, Throckmorton Hall and the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art also will carry the soup.

Other options to replace Sbarro's were explored, including a barbecue possibility, said Bernard Pitts, Union executive director. The decision to bring Campbell's here was based on the fact that Union Food Service's parent company, Chartwell's, carries Campbell's, Pitts said.

K-State's Campbell's is the first installment in the Midwest. There are four or five Campbell's on the East Coast, and they all are on college campuses.

Paul Stolle, Union Food Service director, said the spring semester is a good time to introduce Campbell's to students.

"With spring break, people want nutritional items, and soup plays a part in nutrition," Stolle said.

Campbell's will add options for students in Union Station, said Cindie Snyder, Union marketing and promotion manager. Union Station can seat about 75 people and has a big-screen TV.

"This will complement the programming, activities and lectures that go on near Union Station and in the Union," Snyder said.

Peers reflect on friend's life

By APRIL MIDDLETON

Kansas State Collegian

Friends of Sam Wise said he was a person who truly believed in living every minute of his life to the fullest.

"Sam believed in living it up while he could, and that's what he did," Tony Strnad, junior in agriculture economics, said.

Wise, junior in park resource management, was found dead at 12:03 a.m. Tuesday in his apartment, 1520 Oxford Place. Wise was 21 years old.

An autopsy was performed Tuesday in Manhattan. Riley County Department Sgt. Connie Miller said Wise died from a self-inflicted gunshot wound.

Wise graduated from Satanta Junior/Senior High School in 1998 and took classes at Seward County Community College. He started at K-State in fall 1998.

He worked part-time at Skyvue Quik Lube Inc. while attending school. In his time away from work and school, he enjoyed numerous outdoor recreational activities, including hunting and fishing.

WISE

1st spring Senate meeting to focus on advising

By JESSICA PITTS

Kansas State Collegian

Student Senate plans to begin the semester with the introduction of an advising resolution.

"The advising issue is something we addressed in our campaign, and we are excited to finally bring our work public," Student Body Vice President Dana Pracht said. "We have been working with the administration throughout the year by putting our thoughts and suggestions forward. We hope that we can help implement something more mainstream across campus."

Advisers are not kept accountable for their advising through their performance evaluations. Student Body President Jake Worcester wants to change that.

"Too many faculty are not held responsible for the job they do advising," he said. "If an adviser is doing a poor job, it should show on their performance evaluation. However, it works both ways. If someone is doing an outstanding job of advising, then they should be rewarded. There is currently no incentive for advisers to do a good job, and that can sometimes hurt students."

Worcester said Senate is going to introduce a resolution Thursday that will ask university administrators to keep colleges accountable for advisers' performances and, in turn, ask individual colleges to keep their faculty responsible.

"We also want to try and implement an Advising Bill of Rights that would outline what students should expect from their advisers," he said. "We want it so that as long as the student puts toward the minimum effort, they should expect to receive the minimum advising experience."

Senate also will present suggestions for changes to the election regulations.

"It is nothing too major," Worcester said. "We just want to fine tune some points."

Senate will introduce a bill concerning presidential and vice-presidential campaign spending regulations. In the bill, they hope to eliminate family and faculty contributions to the campaign. Now, the candidates can use $815 of personal funds and can get $15 contributions from students, family and faculty.

"We want to eliminate the family and faculty so that it is more fair across the board," he said.

"Family and faculty could still participate, but that money would go into the candidate's personal fund. This way, hopefully, the candidates rely less on how wealthy they are and more on student support."

Worcester also will introduce a suggestion to eliminate the overall cap of $3,000.

"There is no reason we should limit them to that amount," he said. "If they have lots of student support, they should be able to use it."

Also on the agenda for Thursday's meeting is discussion about mandatory housing inspections and the transportation agreement with the city.

NEWS OF THE WEIRD

In December, CNN founder Ted Turner offered to donate $35 million to cover the shortfall in U.S. dues to the United Nations that Congress is so far unwilling to pay. Two months earlier, however, to show his appreciation to the three local fire departments whose workers had fought summer blazes on his ranch near Gordon, Neb., Turner could only manage donations totaling $3,500.

Still more election news: Al Gore (presumably, the same one who ran for president) was elected by write-in votes as director of the Marion County (Ore.) Soil and Water Conservation board (but was disqualified because he owns no land in the district).

Local adult novelty store going out of business

The adult novelty store Adult Funnybone, at 2708 Anderson Ave., will shut its doors on Sunday.

Owners Butch and Debe Knight, who also own the Adult Funnybone branch in Garden City, Kan., had been renting the location since it opened in February 2000. The owners were not given an option to renew their lease because of a change in the building's ownership.

"Business has been great," Sarah Coats, store employee and junior in criminology and psychology, said. "I love this job and my boss."

Chris Lohman, daughter of Debe Knight and manager of the Manhattan branch, said there are no plans at this time to re-open.

"There is no rental property available in Manhattan," she said.

Lohman also said not many places in Manhattan want to rent to this type of business.

Sarah Hazen, sophomore in English, was curious about Adult Funnybone after driving by and seeing it and also hearing about it from friends.

"I bought a gag gift there for a friend's birthday," Hazen said.

Hazen said it was interesting to check out because not all K-State students are from Manhattan.

"Some things are meant for funny jokes and other things are more serious, but Manhattan is a big enough town that we can handle it" she said.

Adult Funnybone will continue with regular business hours of Tuesday through Saturday, noon to 7 p.m. They also will be open on the final day of business from noon to 7 p.m.

A big portion of the store is marked down and any unsold merchandise will be returned to the Garden City branch.

"There is a definite market for this in town," Coats said.

2 businesses damaged in Hutchinson explosion

HUTCHINSON, Kan. — An explosion of undetermined origin rocked downtown Hutchinson on Wednesday, forcing the evacuation of a one-block area as firefighters battled blazes at two businesses.

Two customers had slight injuries, but the six employees working in the two stores were unhurt. The injured couple — Dennis Lyon and his fiancée, Stacy Smith — had been in a party supply store looking at items for their wedding.

Power was out to much of the downtown area, including the Reno County courthouse, which sent employees home early.

The blast at 10:45 a.m. shattered windows within two blocks. Decor Wedding and Party Supply and Woody's Furniture and Appliance were engulfed in flames — sending a huge column of smoke over downtown.

Tractor-trailer crashes into California Capitol

SACRAMENTO, Calif. — A tractor-trailer careened through downtown streets before ramming into the state Capitol, killing the driver and igniting a fiery explosion that forced the evacuation of lawmakers working on California's power crisis.

No other injuries were reported.

The California Highway Patrol had no immediate comment about a published report that the man believed to have been the driver had a grudge against Gov. Gray Davis.

Investigation continues year after Seton Hall fire

SOUTH ORANGE, N.J. — Shawn Simons was moving too fast to feel any pain, crawling down a hallway through smoke and flames that peeled layers of skin off his face and hands. He wouldn't feel it until he woke up from a coma in the hospital two weeks later.

A year after the fire at a Seton Hall University dormitory that killed three of Simons' fellow students, prosecutors have yet to arrest anyone in a case they have investigated as arson from the start.

"I don't see how this person lives with himself, knowing that they caused so much damage," Simons, 19, glancing down at his scarred, skin-grafted hands, said. "I'm more angry at the fact that this person won't be man enough to admit it."

The blaze in a third-floor lounge of Boland Hall sent more than 600 students fleeing into freezing cold before dawn last Jan. 19; 58 were treated for everything from frostbite to burns.

Women discuss domestic abuse

■ Representatives of diverse cultures talk about violence as part of observance week.

By COLLEEN FOOTE
Kansas State Collegian

Women from a variety of religions and backgrounds came together Wednesday in the Union Courtyard to speak out against domestic violence in honor of Martin Luther King Jr. Observance Week.

Four women joined during the Interfaith Dialogue to discuss the problems, causes and solutions for domestic violence. The four women individually represented different groups, races and religions in society.

Dory Nason, a former police response advocate for the Manhattan Crisis Center, said one-third of all relationships contain domestic abuse, and 22 to 35 percent of women visiting emergency rooms are there because of abuse.

"Abuse can occur anywhere, even in Manhattan," Nason said.

Most American Indian domestic violence is derived from alcohol abuse, said Tammy Goodson, who represented American Indians during the dialogue.

"My father was an alcoholic, and violence occurred within my family when he would come home from the bars in the middle of the night and wake the whole family," Goodson said. "If someone met my dad when he wasn't drunk, then they'd of thought he was the best man."

Goodson said American Indians really aren't different from other cultures because they deal with the same problems and issues as others.

Weaknesses in the Christian faith come from not recognizing domestic violence, said Cathy Bascom, who represented the Christian faith during the dialogue.

"Some Christians see Jesus' suffering on the cross as an example that they must suffer as well," Bascom said. "Jesus never abused women, and if violence occurs, then the foundation of Jesus' teachings is broken."

Bascom said Martin Luther King Jr. should be used as an example for those women who suffer from domestic violence because he had the courage to react against violence, and women need that same courage.

"The denial of any women's rights is abuse," said A'ishah Hardesty, representative of the Muslim faith. "The Koran takes note that women are physically smaller and more emotionally vulnerable, and Muslim men are expected to protect women because of their vulnerability."

Hardesty said many societies think the Islamic culture abuses women since they are required to cover themselves from head to toe.

"I dress this way because it is my right, my choice and my privacy," Hardesty said. "It's no one's business what I'm wearing or what I look like

MATT STAMEY/Collegian

A'ishah Hardesty speaks about her Muslim beliefs towards marriage at a forum Wednesday afternoon in the Union Courtyard. The forum was part of Martin Luther King Jr. week of nonviolence.

underneath."

Hardesty said she believes much of the domestic abuse that occurs in the United States is because many women become too emotionally involved. In the Islamic culture, men and women are not allowed to date, she said.

"Many times, a woman will still marry a man even though she knows he has abusive problems, but she still stays with him because she feels too involved," she said. "Becoming emotionally involved before marriage is a big problem here."

Sara Emerson, senior in architectural engineering and member of K-State's Committee on Religions, said speaking against domestic violence goes along with the teachings of Martin Luther King Jr.

"His work and teachings in nonviolence sends a message that we must all respect each other," Emerson said.

State infant mortality rates rise

■ Riley County numbers lower than statewide mark.

By JESSICA PITTS
Kansas State Collegian

Kansas infant mortality rates — the ratio of infant deaths to live births — edged up to 7.3 infant deaths per 1,000 births in 1999, causing statewide concern.

The statistics, just published by the Kansas Department of Health and Environment, recorded 281 resident infant deaths and 38,748 resident live births, said State Registrar Dr. Lorne Phillips, head of KDHE's Center for Health and Environmental Statistics.

"The rate change from 6.9 in 1998 to 7.3 in 1999 represents a 5.8 percent increase and is cause for concern," Phillips said.

Mike Heideman, public information officer for KDHE, said the general trend for infant mortality rates has been downward until these statistics were released.

"Of course with any increase we are going to be concerned," he said.

"This is a problem that we are not pointing any fingers at a particular cause. There are a lot of factors that enter into the overall picture."

Of all infant deaths in 1999, 43.8 percent were attributed to conditions originating in the prenatal period, 22.4 percent were attributed to congenital anomalies, 15.7 percent to sudden infant death syndrome and 18.1 percent to all other causes.

"Some definite factors that may contribute to infant mortality are access to medical care, prenatal care and health services," Heideman said. "However, it is still important to note that these are some of many factors. Usually, it is a combination of several."

Riley County reported 18 infant deaths out of 4,924 live births between 1994-1998, which is lower than the statewide rate.

Officials at Mercy Health Center Inc. on Sunset Avenue attributed the lower rate to its clientele, saying they are more likely to be married, older and more educated than those at larger hospitals. Due to that fact, they are more likely to seek prenatal care earlier in the pregnancy, and to stick to it.

Mercy Health Center officials also said that most of their clients have access to health care because of their income level, and that they actively seek out better nutrition and healthier lifestyles during their pregnancies. This, in turn, leads to a better outcome for the pregnancies.

Draft updates can be made online

By RACHEL POWERS
Kansas State Collegian

A U.S. law requires that men ages 18-25 register for the Selective Service. If they don't, it's a felony.

A part of registration is keeping information current. It is required that they also notify the Selective Service System of any address change within 10 days of a move, said Alyce Burton, Selective Service public affairs specialist.

The Selective Service has allowed men to register online at www.sss.gov since December 1998. A recent update to the Selective Service Web site now allows men to keep their information current because a change-of-address form has been added to the site.

"For several years, we have had a Web site where men could register for the Selective Services. Dec. 18, 2000, we updated that Web site to allow men age 18-25 to also update their addresses," Burton said. "It is important that we have the most current information."

The addition to the Web page was added for convenience and also is expected to reduce the Selective Service System's printing costs, she said.

"We wanted to make it easier and quicker for men to keep their information up to date with us," Burton said. "Now, instead of going to the post office and filling out a change of address form and paying for first-class postage, Internet access is all that is needed."

Chad Bullock, sophomore in landscape, turf management, natural resource and environmental sciences, said he registered for the Selective Service last year.

"I registered online in February 2000. It was very convenient," Bullock said. "I think the update for address changes will be helpful, too. People won't put it off till the last minute, and it may even increase the number of people registering and keeping their information current."

Ben Warren, sophomore in marketing, said he liked the idea.

"I remember when I registered for the Selective Service," he said. "I had to go to the post office, get a form, fill it out and then mail it in. Completing a form online for registration or change of address would make the process easier and eliminate the cost of postage."

OPINION

THURSDAY, JANUARY 18, 2000

OPINION EDITOR: ERIN SCHNEWEIS
532-0732 ■ letters@pub.ksu.edu

The Collegian's Campus Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on topics relevant to the publication.

On the Topic

Controversial attorney general nominee John Ashcroft is undergoing Senate confirmations this week. What do you think of President-elect Bush's choice?

I think the fact that we are condemning Senator Ashcroft for his morality and godliness is extremely frightening.

In regards to the Ashcroft confirmation, I think we should bring back Janet Reno in 2001. She can bench-press crime.

On the topic of Ashcroft, I mean, how good could this guy be, he lost to a dead guy? Yeah, that's who I want in charge of the law.

Why is it that every white man with strong moral values has to be labeled controversial. What's wrong with this country?

I support John Ashcroft for attorney general because although the liberals would have you believe otherwise, morals are a good thing to have in politics.

John Ashcroft was good for Missouri, and John Ashcroft will be good for the United States of America.

Concerning the Ashcroft discussion, I know several people who are very involved in politics in Missouri and are extremely concerned in a negative way against Ashcroft.

John Ashcroft for chief justice.

Once more, it's our politicians wasting our money in their vie for power.

We didn't want that lame ol' Ashcroft as senator. Why would we want him on the Cabinet?

I think it's a sad day in America when an attorney general designated is scrutinized for living by Christian standards. That is all that I've got to say.

Off the Topic

The only thing worse than a person from a Johnson County is a sophomore in public relations and print journalism from Johnson County.

OK, Ms. McCaffrey, number one: I would be glad to have a '93 Grand Am. Number two: financial aid, your measly little check is hardly enough to make ends meet, and number 3: if you guys actually got that, which your parents probably make more than enough, you would realize it is not enough to live on.

The reason why everybody stereotypes people from Johnson County is because they are the only people who say they are from a county rather than a city.

Who are these guys, and what did they do with our basketball team?

I want to thank the university for rewarding our basketball fans by giving half of us tickets.

Hey, Parking Services, giving 200-plus tickets for parking in the grass to go see a K-State basketball game is no way to encourage attendance. Try putting up a "no parking" sign instead.

Joe Leonard gets injured, and K-State beats a ranked opponent. Coincidence? I think not.

Nothing like going to a K-State basketball game and cheering the Cats on to another win on a top-20 team, and then coming out and finding you've got a $15 ticket. Thanks for the memories, Parking Services.

Hi, Whitney. I just wanted to tell you how much I love you.

I was just wondering can the chairs in Kedzie 106 be any closer together? Because I don't think I can get enough of people stepping on my feet and sticking their butts in my face.

The real world

True love cannot be obtained without 1st loving yourself unconditionally

Once a seemingly long time ago, the word "real" had different meanings. Yes, years ago the word "real" didn't have to do with an idiotic television show or if certain women had breasts that were made to produce milk or instead were made up of silicone.

"Real" was part of my favorite book, "The Velveteen Rabbit" by Margery Williams. When I was younger, that was what my longing was centered around — being real.

"What is REAL?" asked the Rabbit one day.

"Real isn't how you are made," said the Skin Horse. "It's a thing that happens to you."

"Does it hurt?" asked the Rabbit.

"Sometimes," said the Skin Horse, for he was always truthful. "When you are Real you don't mind being hurt."

"Does it happen all at once, like being wound up," he asked, "or bit by bit?"

"It doesn't happen all at once," said the Skin Horse. "You become. It takes a long time. That's why it doesn't often happen to people who break easily, who have sharp edges, or who have to be carefully kept."

"Generally, by the time you are Real, most of your hair has been loved off, and your eyes drop out and you get loose in the joints and very shabby. But these things don't matter at all, because once you are real you can't be ugly, except to people who don't understand."

Now isn't that a more positive way of looking at your heart being broken? Truth be told it is not only a more positive way of looking at painful experiences, but it is also a more realistic way of viewing it as well.

When you are real there are certain things that you learn.

For instance, you stop looking for a human to act as an emotional manicure and fill pieces of your soul, as well as adding a fresh coat of happiness to bring out the shine.

When you are real you understand that this will never happen.

There is only one true way of becoming a real person.

The first part is you have to put your heart out on the line, which basically means letting go of control. The second part, for most people, is to have their heart, which is just a word to sum up their emotions, love and trust, be broken. Crushed. Split into tiny pieces resulting in an emotional pain that can bring forth a sense of physical sickness.

Yet the actual "real" part can not be completed by anyone else. The Skin Horse had only part of his theory correct. Yet, he put the notion of love in someone else's hands without giving any credit to where it must originate.

Agape love, or unconditional love, can not be given or found in anyone else until a person finds that feeling in themselves first. Usually people are very self critical when it comes to loving themselves. They grant themselves with conditional love. Conditional love that disappears when a few pounds are gained. Conditional love that goes out the door when a low grade is received on an exam or project.

No one can give or receive love from another unless they first give and receive that same intense emotion from themselves.

And it is essential that element of love is unconditional. Despite the idiosyncrasies, despite the physical and personal imperfections.

It is time that we stop putting such an emphasis on letting others, and only others, love us. More importantly it is time that we stop waiting for others to make us happy; for others to make us real.

Technology not only barrier to Internet chat

In my unique position as columnist and online editor, I get lots of questions about my job. These range from the simple ("How do you put the paper online every night?") to the perplexing ("Can you get in contact with this reporter who wrote this article from 1983...") to the heartbreaking and ultimately unknowable ("When will you get archives working again?").

But one that comes up from time to time is perfectly logical: "Can't you guys include a Collegian chat room?"

Oh, we could. But ignoring the legal, logistical and technical issues, there's the sad fact that even a moderated, profanity-filtered chat with a guest often just doesn't pan out. I don't know why.

Maybe it's the inherently chaotic nature of the Internet. Maybe Collegian staffers are too focused on the print edition. Maybe we've just got the managerial skills of a frightened bunny in a roller rink. Anyhow, it just doesn't work for us right now.

What? Think I'm making excuses? Fine. Here's a chat transcript from the first (and last) time we tried it: Wednesday, Oct. 18, 2000, a date thumbtacked to my brain under "learning through experience."

Identities have been cosmetically altered to prevent retaliation.

Book board assists students

By CHARLIE MORASCH
Kansas State Collegian

Students wishing to possibly pay less for books and avoid lines at bookstores can use a free service offered at the K-State Student Union.

Started in the early 1990s, the Union has a book board where students can leave messages containing their name, whether they want to buy or sell a particular book, the class and the book that pertains to the class and how they can be reached by phone or e-mail. It's on the south end of the second floor, across from the Copy Center.

Pek Yee Leow, junior in accounting, said she uses the book board instead of the K-State Union Bookstore so she can help other students.

"I'm not trying to make money," Leow said. "It's just that when you try to sell a book back to the Union, it's a ripoff. I'd rather sell the book to another student than the Union."

Marisel Chereña, senior in general chemistry, also said she prefers using the book board over bookstores.

"It's just better," Chereña said. "It's usually a lot cheaper, so I like it."

The book board allows students to bargain with one another on buying and selling prices.

Carrie Mitchell, book division manager and assistant manager of the Union Bookstore, said the

"The bookstore, of course, then did it. We did it because the Student Union is for the students, not for anybody else."

— Carrie Mitchell, book division manager and assistant manager of the Union Bookstore book board came about because students demanded it.

"It was started either in 1993 or 1994 and was just something the students asked for," Mitchell said. "The bookstore, of course, then did it. We did it because the Student Union is for the students, not for anybody else."

Mitchell said that because the Union is non-profit, there is no competition between the book board and the bookstore.

"We get our money from student fees," Mitchell said.

"Whatever money that the bookstore, the Copy Center or the Food Court makes goes back into supporting this building. That goes towards the operation, upgrading and any money left over goes for a lot of the types of events that happen in the Courtyard and around the Union," Mitchell said.

"That's why there is no problem with us supporting something like the book board. We're supported by student fees, so it's important for us to be real open."

Mitchell said book board users must be aware of some important factors when buying a book from someone else.

"Often, professors change their minds about a class," Mitchell said. "Usually, 30 to 40 classes a semester change books. Professors don't come back or they simply change books or they find a book they'd rather have, so then they come back and cancel."

Mitchell said another factor that can make book buying difficult is the fact that every book has dozens of versions, and students should check the number over the bar code of the book to ensure the exact version they need.

"Students can even call the bookstore and request the number from us," Mitchell said. "That's just another important thing students should be careful about."

Students prepare for departure to study abroad this semester

By COLLEEN FOOTE
Kansas State Collegian

Instead of becoming reacquainted with friends after winter break, some students are spending the beginning of the semester saying goodbye to friends, Manhattan and K-State before they leave to study abroad in February.

Stephanie Higgins, junior in speech communication, will spend this semester studying in the Czech Republic, but for now she's working in Manhattan.

"Right now, it is really strange being in Manhattan and not attending school," said Higgins, who works in the Hale Library Copy Center.

"I'm spending my time preparing for my departure and saying goodbye to all of my friends."

Higgins, who grew up in Manhattan, said studying outside of the United States will give her a more worldly view and a diverse cultural experience that she cannot obtain at K-State.

"Studying in a foreign country is a childhood dream of mine," Higgins said. "I'm both nervous and excited about this once-in-a-lifetime possibility."

Crissan Zeigler, an international educational adviser at the Office of International Programs, said 100 K-State students will study abroad this semester. This is the largest amount ever during a semester, Zeigler said.

Some K-State students will continue their academic studies in Spain, Great Britain, Australia, Costa Rica, Mexico, France, Sweden, Germany, Czech Republic, Switzerland, Russia, Iceland, Korea, Canada and Ireland.

"Before students leave, they must understand that this is an experience that will last a lifetime," Higgins said.

"You can't have a complete undergraduate university education without some universal experience."

Kara Keener, junior in apparel and textile marketing, said she chose to study abroad because of the unique benefits studying in a foreign country offers.

"There are so many opportunities and things that I can do there that I can't do in Manhattan," said Keener, who will spend the next nine months in Australia.

"This is an opportunity that I may never have again."

Keener is spending her time commuting from her home in Kansas City to Manhattan, where she waitresses at a local restaurant.

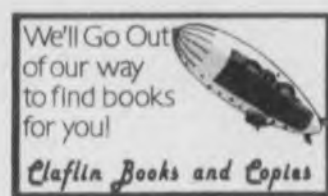

"It is so weird not going to school and not seeing my friends everyday," Keener said. "I feel left out when my friends talk about events that are going to happen during the semester because I know I won't be a part of them."

Even though both Keener and Higgins will miss K-State this semester, they realize the opportunities they will receive in another country will outweigh the things they miss at K-State.

"About 99.9 percent of the students who study abroad come back with a positive experience and a higher self-esteem," Zeigler said. "Both their role in the world and their future plans change."

Higgins and Keener also are spending their time left in the United States preparing for their departure.

"I've got my passport and all of the appropriate information I'll need about my studies," Higgins said. "I'm ready to go."

TEXAS-SIZED RELIEF

Cats break 4-game skid with 72-63 victory over Longhorns

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

Now Kim Woodlee can sleep. K-State's senior guard found herself battling a spell of insomnia sparked by a string of losses that left the Wildcats 0-4 in the Big 12 and in desperate need of a big win.

That win, the Cats' first in five games, came Wednesday night in front of 5,117 fans at Bramlage Coliseum — a following, Woodlee said, that deserved the win as much as she did.

"These fans were unbelievable. I had a ton of energy," she said afterwards. "I fed off the crowd all night."

Wildcat fans had much to cheer about after a 72-63 win over the 17th-ranked Longhorns spoiled Texas head coach Jody Conradt's 1,000th career game.

Post play was key for the Wildcats, as freshman Andrea Armstrong shouldered the responsibility of limiting Longhorn star Stacy Stephens' touches for much of the game.

STEVEN DEARINGER/Collegian

K-State guard/forward Kristin Rethman gets hit as she dribbles past Texas guard JoRuth Woods during the first half Wednesday at Bramlage Coliseum.

"My whole goal was to just keep her off the boards and not let her get the second shot," Armstrong said. "We knew that they were real aggressive on rebounding, so that was key."

Texas was limited to just four second-chance points in the first half, but K-State's dismal 38-percent shooting and 12 first-half turnovers weighed the Cats down for the game's first frame.

However, the Cats were near perfect from the free throw line in the first half, and head coach Deb Patterson's squad went to the intermission confident, trailing the Longhorns by just three.

"I felt very good about the way we played our first half," Patterson said.

"We went through a little segment where we lost our focus in the backcourt, and we answered on the defensive end."

On the heels of an early 9-0 run, K-State took a 39-29 lead with 13:57 to play and never looked back. Behind Woodlee's four three-pointers in the second half, the Cats built a 15 point lead with 6:24 to play, and the crowd began to think upset.

Patterson talked of individual responsibility among the Wildcats' veteran perimeter players following Saturday's loss, and Woodlee and frontcourt teammate Kristin Rethman more than accounted for themselves Wednesday.

"For us, the thing that means the most is that we took the floor with the single-minded focus to handle our responsibilities," Patterson said.

After being kept scoreless in the first half, Woodlee's 12 points in the second half put the game away in a contest in which normally-reliable Nicole Ohlde struggled from the field.

Junior guard Kristin Rethman followed up her perfect shooting performance Saturday by repeating the feat for the game's first 12:06, finishing with 24 points to lead the Cats.

Armstrong also made an impact on offense, a result she said was due to feeling more at ease against Texas' physical post play. The freshman forward scored 18 points and grabbed five offensive rebounds.

"I'm feeling a lot more comfortable," she said. "It feels good to play against these physical, big players. I'm more relaxed and know what to expect now."

With their first conference win in the books, the Cats now focus on a 3 p.m. Saturday matchup at Missouri, where Patterson said her team must perform like they did against the Longhorns in order to win.

"We have to be this good every night in order to be competitive," she said.

JEANEL DRAKE/Collegian

Junior Shalondra Booker goes up for a shot in the women's basketball game Wednesday night at Bramlage Coliseum. Booker scored eight points in the 72-63 victory against the 17th-ranked team.

K-State looks to defense, limits shooting chances of Texas guard

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

When Texas forward Stacy Stephens entered halftime with 14 points on seven of 11 shooting, K-State head coach Deb Patterson knew the solution was simple — don't let her touch the basketball.

To do so, Patterson switched to a zone defense in the second half, limiting Stephens to just six shot attempts in the final 20 minutes and forcing the Longhorns to score from the perimeter.

When Texas didn't find its outside stroke until late in the game, the damage already was done, as the Wildcats overcame a 28-25 halftime deficit to upset No. 17 Texas 72-63.

Patterson said minimizing Stephens' touches in the second half was key, as the Cat zone kept her to just two field goals after the intermission.

"We knew going in that their post players were just so strong, skilled and such a major part of that offense that we felt like we needed to try to crowd some of the passing lanes down low," Patterson said.

"So, going in, that was a big part of our point of emphasis."

"We felt like if we got Stephens in a lot of one-on-one isolation situations, she was probably going to have the edge."

Stephens had that edge in the first half and, as a result, Cat forward Andrea Armstrong said it was a focus to shut her down at the break.

"It was a big key to keep her not only from getting the ball, but off the boards," Armstrong said of Stephens, who finished the game with 19 points and 12 rebounds. "We knew they were going to go inside a lot. The main focus was just to keep them off the boards and not give them second shots."

Guard Kim Woodlee said she agreed, but said increased communication might have paid the biggest dividend for the Cats in the final frame.

"We were in the zone, and Texas was very athletic with great penetrating guards, so our focus was definitely to keep the penetrators in front of the lane," she said.

That adjustment prevented Texas' quick guards from dishing the ball inside for easy lay-ups, further shutting down the Horns' inside game.

At any rate, though, the first six minutes of the second half proved fatal for Texas, as they could manage only one point on the Cat zone.

Overall, Patterson was pleased with K-State's entire defensive effort against the Horns, especially in the first half, even though Stephens hurt the Cats in the paint.

"Texas is such an explosive ball club — they score the ball so quickly and usually in great runs," she said. "So, for us to be walking into the locker room with them posting 28 on the board, we said, 'Now, listen, we're doing something right defensively.'"

"And that's an encouragement. I thought we defended extremely well."

Track athletes worth watching

This might come as a complete surprise to most of the students on campus, but K-State actually has a track team.

And it's really good. And everybody can watch it compete this weekend — for free. I'm not kidding.

K-State's track team has athletes you wouldn't believe. I mean, these people run and jump and throw like superhumans. You know the sprinters you see on television; the ones that are so fast they require 9 billion speed film to photograph? That's the kind K-State has.

Remember when the Olympics were on TV, and some runners would start running a race as fast as they could? You'd get up to go make a sandwich, make a phone call, maybe clean your room and then come back to find the same runners finishing their final lap — at the same speed as when the race began.

That's the kind of runners K-State has.

Sophomore Amy Mortimer finished sixth in the NCAA Cross Country Championships, finishing the 6000 meter course in 20:50 — that's 10 minutes, not hours. That's the equivalent of running from Ford Hall to Aggieville — or St. Isidore's Catholic Student Center, if you prefer — and back almost three times. She's pretty fast.

Even more amazing, two other women, Korene Hinds and Amanda Crouse, are just as fast as Mortimer.

Their coach, Randy Cole, is a three-time Midwest region cross country coach of the year. Everything about the women's middle distance runner screams excellence. Even the runners who aren't in the top three, Annie Wetterhus and Nicole Grose, are phenoms in their own right.

On the men's side, Shadrack Kimeli, who has the coolest name on the team, placed first in the 3,000 meters. He also won the 800m with a time of 1:53:55. Most students couldn't run 400 meters in that time.

The best part about these runners is that, unlike their Olympic counterparts, anybody can watch them. If you were lucky, the Olympics showed maybe one long distance race at 2 a.m.

These athletes will run this Friday evening and Saturday afternoon in the comfy confines of Ahearn Field House.

But maybe running's not your thing. Fine. K-State also has throwers and jumpers that are pretty good, too. Sophomore Rebekah Green already has thrown an NCAA qualifying mark in the shot put with a toss of 52-11. To put that into perspective, all those guys who live at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex and occasionally throw up 350 pounds on the bench press to impress everyone else probably couldn't throw the shot 52 feet.

In the pole vault, junior Jim Gruenbacher placed second at the KSU Invitational last weekend with a height of 16-0.75. In the triple jump, freshman Queeneth Evurunobi set a new women's KSU Invitational record with a jump of 40-0.

Of course, maybe there's people out there thinking, "Yeah, sure, they're good. But they're not near the athletes who play on the football team."

I beg to differ. Football speedsters Aaron Lockett and Terrance Newman have both run track for K-State. They did well, but didn't overwhelm the competition. K-State has sent track and field graduates to the Olympics on several occasions. Kenny Harrison, a former Cat, won a gold medal in the triple jump in the 1996 Atlanta games. Steve Fritz finished fourth in the decathlon in Atlanta, and he still coaches for K-State.

These people are good, real good, and everybody should go see them this Friday and Saturday. Or at least, on your way to Aggieville, or church, try and run as fast as Mortimer, Hinds, Crouse or Kimeli.

You can't — I guarantee it.

Student designer creates children's clothing with cultural messages

By KATIE LANE
Kansas State Collegian

Calvin Klein, Ralph Lauren and Tommy Hilfiger all are famous designers who make millions of dollars creating their own clothing lines. Sarah Wesselowski already is following in their footsteps, with her own line of children's clothing.

Wesselowski, senior in apparel design, said she first got interested in designing clothing in high school.

"I have been designing since I was a junior in high school. I started with little things like purses," she said.

Inspiration for her designs comes from different sources, Wesselowski said.

"Teachers always have great suggestions and ideas," she said. "I also get many of my ideas from historic sources and fashion magazines."

Wesselowski's line of children's clothing, displayed on the second floor of Justin Hall, includes three dresses, each using a specific culture as the theme. She has entered her dresses in two competitions, the Fashion Group of Kansas City Design competition and the International Textile and Apparel Association Design competition.

"Sarah received third place at the Kansas City competition for her Australian dress. The judges commented on her wonderful ideas and creativity," said Sherry Haar, assistant professor of apparel design.

The ITAA competition was in November, and Haar said it is an extremely difficult competition.

"The acceptance rate for the ITAA competition is only 33 percent. All three of her pieces were accepted, and that is quite a tribute to her work," Haar said. "She was approached by department stores after one of the competitions because the dresses are interactive and informative."

The three children's dresses Wesselowski designed represent a different culture and attempt to teach the children something about that culture.

"The concept of the dresses is to educate the children. These garments give the parents a chance to teach their child about different cultures and animals," Wesselowski said.

Janice Huck, associate professor of apparel design, said Wesselowski has a unique approach to designing.

"Sarah incorporates a functional aspect to her designs. That is different than most children's clothing you see."

Each of Wesselowski's dresses includes a hang tag that explains the culture the dress is trying to represent.

"The kangaroo dress is trying to teach children something interesting about Australia. It has a big pocket in front, similar to a kangaroo," Wesselowski said. "My ice cream dress has a Japanese theme and teaches the words 'pink,' 'green' and 'ice cream' in Japanese."

Wesselowski plans to graduate this spring after finishing the apparel and design program. This year she primarily has worked with her original designs, Haar said.

"The program begins in lower-level classes by teaching students basic construction. Each class builds on that, and the more advanced classes only create original designs," she said. "Sarah really has great concept development. This idea of educating children through clothing was generated in her first class."

Huck said she agreed, and also said Wesselowski is a very reliable student.

"Sarah has a very good work ethic. You know, you can always count on her to be efficient and still do a great job," Huck said.

Haar said one of Wesselowski's greatest strengths is her creativity.

"She has very unique ideas and is very talented in rendering those concepts. Her ability to express her creativity visually really sets her apart."

Wesselowski said she would like to get a job either working in technical design with children's clothing or making trend boards for a company.

"Children's clothing is so fun and exciting. You can use a whole variety of colors and there isn't a whole lot you can't do. It definitely isn't as restrictive as adult clothing," Wesselowski said.

The distinctive difference between designing children's clothing and adult clothing liberates the designer, Haar said. Though businesses in the industry might have the attitude that children's clothing needs to be cute, that is not necessarily true, she said.

Wesselowski said in the future she would like to sell her own clothing line, but until then she is looking to gain experience.

"Sometime down the road I want to sell my own clothes," she said. "Right now I just want to get experience in a company setting. I'd like to see how the industry runs first."

KING

"It was a tense period that fall and spring," Bergen said. "There was a lack of understanding on both sides of the spectrum."

After hearing King speak at K-State, Bergen said the news of his assassination a few months later affected the K-State community.

"I was shocked to hear he was shot," Bergen said. "This man was here, and he was such an important person. It made us wonder what was happening at that time in a nation that we would shoot someone like him."

Bergen questioned if King would have been as honored today if he had lived.

"If he had not died, would he have been as well-known?" Bergen said. "Would we honor him if he had lived? I can't answer these questions. They are just important thoughts."

In the classroom, John Graham, junior in accounting, said Wise was very goal-oriented and was always trying to achieve something.

"Even if it seemed like the smallest thing, Sam wouldn't stop until he conquered it," Graham said.

"He always had something planned for himself."

Those closest to Wise said he befriended many people during his first year on campus and continued to reach out to people he casually met.

"Sam liked people — it was like he was a people magnet," Jeff Hempen, junior in open option, said.

"He could click with anyone he met for the first time."

Friends said Wise will be remembered for a variety of things, but mostly as a generous and patient friend.

"Sam was a great listener," said Sarah Prentice, sophomore in lifespan and human development. "He was always listening. No matter what it was you needed to talk about, Sam was there for you."

Graham said Wise was always helping someone out.

"He was generous with his time and his money," Graham said.

"He never turned down a friend when they needed something, and he had a lot of friends."

Keira Mann, sophomore in creative writing, said losing a friend obviously is difficult, but remembering Wise as she saw him every day makes it easier for her and others who knew him.

"The way it ended said nothing about the way it was," Mann said.

"We will always remember Sam playing pool, guitar and listening to music. That's what he liked to do."

Graveside services for Wise will be at 2 p.m. Saturday at Santa Cemetery.

Senate to make advisers more accountable

By JESSICA PITTS

Kansas State Collegian

Student Senate approved a resolution to recommend support for advising accountability at Thursday's meeting.

"The best we can do is strongly recommend," Student Body President Jake Worcester said. "There has been a lot of work done with the provost and with the Faculty Senate president, and we feel confident that they will take our recommendation and implicate it."

Senate is asking colleges to implement procedures to hold advisers, both faculty and professional, accountable for their advising. Senate also wants to urge the university administration to hold the colleges and departments accountable for overall advising performance.

"Quality advising is something that is vital to a student's performance in school," Worcester said. "We want there to be some guidelines set and faculty to be rewarded for quality advising and held accountable for inadequate advising."

The Faculty Handbook now outlines certain advising priorities and goals, but does not outline how they are to be implemented and how advisers will be kept accountable for their performance. Senate members want to change that.

"Advising is one of the most important things at the university," Dana Pracht, student body vice president, said.

"Students need to know they can depend on their adviser, and this recommendation is a good start. Advising not only affects the student's curriculum, but also their career choice. That is something that needs to be taken seriously."

In other action, Senate also presented suggestions for changes to election regulations.

"There are some lengthy and unnecessary wording in the codes, and we just want to fine-tune some of those points," Worcester said.

Included in the referral are updates on presidential and vice presidential campaign spending regulations. Senate introduced a bill that eliminates family and faculty contributions to campaigns. Also in the new bill, candidates can use $800 of personal funds, down from the previous $815, but will have an unlimited amount they can raise from student contributions, up from the previous limit set at $3,000.

"Our intent with this is not to penalize a candidate who has a lot of student support," Worcester said. "Instead, it would restrict the ability of a candidate to buy an election with personal contributions. It restricts personal funds, but does not limit raised supported funds."

Worcester said candidates still would be able to accept money from family and faculty, but that it would have to be used as part of their personal funds.

The bill also raised the maximum amount of student contributions from $15 to $20.

"We want candidates who can get the student support to take it, and use it to their best advantage," Worcester said. "That is what it should be intended for."

*"I have a lot to learn from everyone here ...
I also have a lot to teach people."*

Inauguration draws both excitement, indifference

By JENNIFER O'NEILL

Kansas State Collegian

The votes are in, and the truth is, many K-State students were more interested in the Florida recounts than in the inauguration of President-elect George W. Bush on Saturday.

"I'm not planning on watching the inauguration on TV because the whole thing was so drawn out, and I already know who the president is," Lauran Cowdrey, senior in mass communication, said.

Like Cowdrey, most students said they wanted to wash their hands of the whole thing and don't care to watch Saturday's events.

"I'm not planning on watching it because I'm sick of the whole thing, but I am interested more so than I have been in the past just because of the scandal," Jarrett Lee, freshman in business administration, said.

Others won't be tuning in to see the inauguration because their candidate didn't win.

"I'm not interested in the ceremony or how many idiots he can get there to perform," said Jason Matthews, senior in agricultural economics and president of Young Democrats. "I am interested in the power transition, but not of the events of the 20th."

Matthews said he would catch the content of the speech in Sunday's paper, and says he's planning on participating in a protest in Wichita.

Those who are planning on watching George W. Bush be sworn in as the 43rd president of the United States said they will mainly be tuning in to see the Gas plumes erupt up to 30 feet high in Hutchinson

By ROXANA HEGEMAN

The Associated Press

HUTCHINSON, Kan. — Police evacuated hundreds of people — including children at three schools — after an explosion Thursday at a mobile home park was blamed on a natural gas geyser, one of several that have sprouted on the city's east side.

The blast followed Wednesday's explosion and fire that leveled two businesses in downtown Hutchinson, injuring two people — two days after fire destroyed a Hutchinson hotel under construction.

Some of the Thursday geysers, noticeable by plumes of vapor mixed with soil, reached as high as 30 feet, police said. The cause was being investigated, but an expert from the Kansas Geological Survey said the source might be a disconnection in an old gas well in the area.

Police said several blocks of houses were evacuated after the fire, as well as students from St. Teresa's and Avenue A elementary schools and a third school. Residents were being warned to notify police if they discovered sinkholes on their property.

Hutchinson Fire Chief Gary Frazier said five natural gas leaks were reported on the city's east side. Oil field fire workers from Oklahoma were arriving to help deal with the problem.

The Kansas National Guard sent about 15 vehicles, mainly Humvees, and 30 troops from its Hutchinson armory to help evacuate families and patrol the area.

Rex Buchanan, associate director of the Kansas Geological Survey in Lawrence, said Wednesday's explosion occurred near a natural gas well that had been drilled in 1924 and might be leaking gas.

"You don't just randomly see natural gas coming to the surface where it's concentrated enough for a fire to start," he said. "One possibility is that something has happened to the old well, like a disconnection."

Through their eyes

"If you're a different color, diversity or ethnicity, you always have to prove your point; your word. There's always that second guess."

■ Graduate student learns lessons in dealing with workplace discrimination during student-teaching experiences.

When Lovell Wilkerson III looks at a person, he sees two eyes, two ears, two arms and legs, and a face. He said he does not believe people are different on the outside, but the thoughts, emotions and feelings on the inside are what makes a person special and unique.

"There are differences from which we all come," Wilkerson said. "People need to see that what makes everyone different is what is on the inside and understand that."

Wilkerson, graduate student in education administration and leadership studies, grew up in Cincinnati, Ohio, where he played soccer and excelled in school work. After graduating high school, he went to the University of Kentucky, where he graduated with degrees in elementary education and sociology. Wilkerson said of all the experiences he has had and all the places he has lived, he remembers his student teaching experience in Kentucky as one time when he has experienced racism in his life.

"When I went through my student teaching, I was in a public school of almost all white children," Wilkerson said. "The teacher I worked with told me

Multiracial woman battles against ethnic stereotypes

When Christina Lindsay looks at a test form and must choose her race, she chooses "other." She is 19 years old and multiracial. Her mother is half American Indian and half Mexican. Her father is white.

"I always put other, because I don't want to choose," Lindsay, sophomore in biology, said. "I don't want to pick my mom or my dad."

Growing up in Emporia, Kan., she never really noticed her skin was a different color than those around her. She grew up in an all-white neighborhood and attended a predominately all-white elementary school. She saw herself as she saw others, and only once did she get made fun of.

In middle school and high school, things changed. Comments began to be said, and stereotypes were formed. Not only did stereotypes, but one question that Lindsay has learned to despise.

"I'm so sick of people asking me, 'What are you?'"

The answer, she said, is always the same.

"I'm me."

QUESTION OF THE WEEK

Q: Where can I get some tips on how to take tests and ways to study better?

A: University Counseling Services not only provides individual counseling for students, but also has Web sites on topics such as study strategies, test taking tips, stress busting and groups and workshops. Each site has detailed tips that are updated frequently and features links to helpful Web sites. Check out the new programs UCS offers at www.ksu.edu/ucs.

Leukemia society seeks volunteers for marathon

This spring, the Kansas Chapter of the Leukemia and Lymphoma Society is recruiting and training volunteers through its Team in Training program.

Training and fitness counseling for running and biking will take place for four to five months in preparation led by area coaches.

"The alumni become coaches to continue their support for the cause," Kelly Gerstenkorn, campaign manager, said.

The volunteering teams will participate in the 2001 Suzuki Rock 'N' Roll Marathon on June 3, 2001, in San Diego, and the Santa Fe Century 100-mile bike ride on May 20 in Santa Fe, N.M.

The Rock 'N' Roll Marathon is a two-night trip with a limit of 20,000 participants, and the Santa Fe Century is a three-night trip with 10,000 participants.

Gerstenkorn said the program has been successful.

"We have a 99.9 percent completion rate," she said.

An informational meeting for volunteers will be 4 p.m. Saturday at the Frame Maker in Westloop. Team in Training is open to everyone.

"At the meeting, we will let people know of our strong commitment to them," Gerstenkorn said. "We usually receive a strong commitment back from the volunteers."

Protestors, officials clash over inaugural measures

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Tensions between inaugural protesters and police rose Thursday as police arrested three activists who scaled the Interior Department's headquarters and unfurled a huge banner opposed to the new Bush administration's environmental policies.

Other demonstrators were set to argue before a federal judge, trying to roll back some of the security measures planned for Saturday's swearing-in ceremony and inaugural parade.

The protest by Greenpeace-USA activists came on the opening day of confirmation hearings for Interior Secretary-designate Gale Norton. Members of the group have expressed concern that Norton would allow energy exploration in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge.

Two protesters used ropes and pulleys to lower themselves outside the third floor of the department's headquarters, unfurling a red, white and blue banner that read, "Bush and Norton: Our Land, Not Oil Land!"

After 45 minutes, the activists descended to the street and surrendered peacefully.

John Passacantando, executive director of Greenpeace-U.S.A., said more protests were possible.

"Whoever is appointed as interior secretary must protect and defend our natural lands and natural resources," he said.

Anticipating the largest inaugural demonstrator presence since tens of thousands marched against the Vietnam War in 1973, law enforcement officers representing 16 agencies have added new twists to their usual precautions for President-elect Bush's swearing-in at the Capitol and the inaugural parade route to the White House.

Confirmation hearings running well for Powell

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Discussion of even the most divisive foreign policy issues provoked only mild exchanges as Secretary of State-designate Colin Powell marched inexorably toward easy Senate confirmation.

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee was due to vote Thursday afternoon on Powell's nomination, but Sen. Jesse Helms, R-N.C., and several of his colleagues already were referring to Powell as "Mr. Secretary" during his confirmation hearing Wednesday.

Sen. Joseph Biden, D-De., said he was dazzled as Powell outlined his thoughts on missile defenses, the future of the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty, turmoil in Zimbabwe and the wisdom of using sanctions as a tool for taming nations that misbehave.

Police wrongly focused on Carruth, lawyer says

CHARLOTTE, N.C. — Investigators suffered from tunnel vision by targeting Rae Carruth after his pregnant girlfriend was shot to death, a defense lawyer told jurors at the former football player's murder trial.

Police wrongly settled on the theory that Carruth arranged a contract hit on Cherica Adams to get out of paying child support, attorney David Rudolf said in closing arguments Monday.

"They weren't looking for information," he said.

"They were looking for confirmation."

Instead, authorities should have focused on self-incriminating statements by admitted triggerman and co-defendant Van Brett Watkins that would have cleared Carruth, Rudolf said.

Speaker calls for more integration in education system, nationwide

By OLENA NIKOLAYENKO
Kansas State Collegian

Farai Chideya challenged a K-State audience to step back and think over its perception of being an American at the beginning of the 21st century.

"I come to you as somebody who is on the journey to redefine the essence of being an American," she said.

Chideya, author, journalist and news anchor, spoke Thursday for K-State's Martin Luther King Jr. Observance Week, as she brought back the memory of King's visit to K-State.

Don Fallon, coordinator of religious activities, recalled King's visit.

"I am old enough to remember when he came to this campus and spoke to students in 1968," Fallon, said.

"I always saw him as a model of how justice can be carried out. His vision has a meaning today."

During the past 50 years, the United States has seen an influx of immigrants, which painted the fabric of American life in many colors. However, segregation still remains on the political agenda in our multicultural society," Chideya said.

"On the surface, the USA is becoming more diverse and in reality, more divided," Chideya said.

She illustrated her point by examining the American education system.

"Two-thirds of African-American kids still go to predominantly black schools," she said. "This is not living up to King's dream."

She criticized the modern day education system for poor presentation of civil rights movements in the USA.

"American schools do not often do a good job of teaching civil rights movements if the books we are learning from were written 20 or 30 years ago," she said.

Students were encouraged by Chideya to challenge our campus community to achieve true equality.

"Young Americans today have a much broader sense of what diversity means than their parents," she said.

Requiring young people to read widely and think broadly is something Chideya said is important.

"Just to say 'a colorblind school' is not enough," she said.

"The real underlying reason why schools are segregated is because our society is not integrated."

Life in Manhattan still features occasions of discrimination for Philippine-born male

By NANCY HULL
Kansas State Collegian

Vaughn Deguzman had his first taste of racism at K-State before he ever enrolled in classes.

Deguzman, who is Asian, was born in the Philippines and has lived in Kansas with his family since he was nine. Shortly after he applied at K-State during his senior year at Junction City High School, the university told him he would have to take a test before admittance.

The test had questions such as "Can you understand English?" and "Can you speak English?"

"They saw an ethnic last name and I was born in the Philippines and that's all they saw," said Deguzman, senior in life science and gerontology. "It was just assumed that I didn't speak English."

He said that because of his race, he's always had to work hard to prove himself.

"If you're a different color, diversity or ethnicity, you always have to prove your point; your word," he said. "There's always that second guess."

Deguzman has been second guessed many times. There was the time in high school when he was at a fast-food restaurant, and a worker took a double take of Deguzman and his African-American friends and said "Wow, we don't get too many colored folks around here."

He said he has been ignored and refused service at clothing stores many times.

Once, when Deguzman was working a fund raiser for his fraternity, Phi Beta Sigma, a young girl walked up to him and his fraternity brothers and said, "My mom said that white and colored people don't mix."

"It's just hard to believe these towns in Kansas have experienced no ethnicity," he said.

But he said the comments do get to him sometimes. "It angers me, but I can't let ignorance predict how I'm going to be or how I'm going to be perceived," Deguzman said.

One incident in particular left him very angry.

Last semester, he was sitting on the trunk of his car while he was filling it up with gas at a Manhattan convenience store. A friend of his pulled up next to him, and they started talking. After a couple minutes, an employee came out by the pumps and wrote down the license plate number of Deguzman's Nissan Maxima while another employee stood by the window.

Deguzman said the employees told him there had been some run-ins with people stealing gas. He said he did not become visibly angry with the store.

"I could yell back, but what does that cause?" Deguzman said. "I've just got to walk away."

His girlfriend, Maia Magana, said Deguzman doesn't let the way he's treated get him down.

"I think he's upset the world's like that, but he's good-natured in the long run," Magana said.

While he said the state of racism is improving in Manhattan, Deguzman still feels the tension. He often feels like he's either too light or too dark, he said.

"Sometimes I feel too dark because in class people will sit around me, not next to me," he said.

"I'm too light with my black friends because they say I haven't gone through as much as they have."

He said he thinks he's both lost and gained things in life because of the racism he's experienced.

Patience and opportunities are things he said he's lost. "Maybe I should have said something when people made jokes about race."

He said he's gained integrity and satisfaction from his accomplishments like becoming president of his fraternity.

"I've gained the feeling of breaking a barrier and achieving more than you think," he said. "It's just that feeling of knowing you could overcome a certain standard."

also marked the beginning of her never-ending battle against stereotypes.

"There's a stereotype, and I don't want to be stereotyped as a stupid Mexican, so I feel like I have to prove myself to my teachers," she said.

For that reason, she became dedicated to studying and achieving good grades — anything to combat the stereotypes and statistics. Her mother, who never went to college, made it very clear to her how important education was.

"She would always say, 'I want you to do better than me,'" Lindsay said.

Her mother never had the chance to go to school. No one gave her the chance.

One of Lindsay's good friends from high school said Lindsay always worked harder than others to prove herself worthy of respect.

"When she walks into a situation, she automatically walks into a stereotype, and she has to break through those stereotypes every time," Kristen Fisher, junior in advertising, said. "She works a lot harder at her goals to prove people wrong."

Not only did her education become important, but also standing up for herself. She said people in her high school usually treated her the same as everyone else, but there always were the few exceptions — at times, even her friends.

"People at school were pretty accepting, but people give me crap. They say stupid things like, 'Do you want a burrito?'" she said. "And that really pisses me off. One of my friends would call me a painter, and it really pissed me off. Even though they were just joking, it made me mad."

She said because of her multi-ethnic background, she catches grief both ways sometimes. Being told she doesn't act Mexican enough, or should be more in touch with the Mexican culture, is something she also faces.

Since her journey to K-State, the number of comments have decreased. Greater diversity and older people are what Lindsay attributes this to.

While it is better, it still is in the back of her mind.

"Once in a while, I think, 'Why are those people staring at me? Is it because I'm young, or because I'm Mexican — or dating, if a guy doesn't like me, is it because I'm Mexican, because I'm not that blonde hair, blue-eyed girl?'"

When Lindsay graduated from high school, she graduated with honors. Now, as a K-State student, she continues to strive for good grades and to break through stereotypes. She continues to strive for the equality Martin Luther King Jr. strove for throughout his life, and through her experiences, she said she's learned the dream still has a way to go.

"I think more has to be done, but I think it's better than it has been," she said.

Being Lindsay's friend since fourth grade, Fisher agreed there is much left to be done.

"I think it's becoming more and more accomplished, but I still think there's a lot to be done," Fisher said. "I think the way it's turning out now, it's not just a black and white or Hispanic stereotype anymore. It's everyone. Everyone has a stereotype they have to break through."

K-State needs to concentrate on good advice

We evaluate our professors, so it is of extreme importance that we evaluate those who help determine our schedule. It is time, past time, that we evaluate our advisers.

Not only should advisers, who are usually professors acting as advisers, work more with students, it also needs to be the other way around.

Students need to take more responsibility for their course schedule. By that same token, advisers need to be more prepared and willing to assist students who are seeking advice for their future. Advisers need to keep in mind that students are not just 15-minute blocks of their time per semester.

Those 15-minute time periods can result in a semester that is worthy of the hours, of the tuition, of the hard work and of the money invested. Students have been burned, so to speak, a number of times because of two factors: they didn't know what to take and it becomes apparent that their advisers didn't either.

By evaluating advisers, there would be encouragement for those who are doing an above average job and hopefully disciplinary actions for those who are doing an extremely poor job of assisting students.

There needs to be incentives offered to those advisers who work hard to help students.

Another change that needs to occur is how professors are evaluated. The semester teacher evaluations are of no threat to tenured professors. K-State needs to continue to demand excellence from both new and tenured professors, students and advisers.

Johnson County kids suck.

What good's a fire truck if your house always catches on fire?

Who was the hot, sexy guy doing the 'NSync dance at the basketball game last night?

About today's defense of the Johnson County people, I come from the Kansas City area and I would like to add this: they can't drive.

Hey, Joe Leonard, I think you're hot. Will you be my valentine?

Right on, Sarah McCaffrey. I'm poor, from Johnson County and damn proud.

This is to the technology people. I would just like to say, you better give me Napster or give me death.

I'm in a line of about 10 cars. I've been waiting for about 25 minutes. Parking Services, when are you going to realize that you have a serious problem?

Devote all year to Civil rights movement

Fighting injustice should be concern for everyone each day

As the dust begins to clear from a week of celebrating the accomplishments and sacrifices of Martin Luther King Jr., and our lives are once again relegated to the monotony of status quo, one can't help but ask, "Whatever happened to the civil rights movement?"

The civil rights movement has become lost amidst the celebration of one man and his dream. It has been reduced from a driving force of change and progress to an incoherent whisper that is only allowed to become audible seven days out of every year. Its vision of absolute equality has been all but blinded by a suppressive society that favors the restrictive chains of perceived equality.

Admittedly, the civil rights movement has made some dramatic progress in the past 20 years. It has opened the doors for women and minorities to attain upper level positions in corporations, politics and the government. It has seen the number of women and minority students enrolled in college steadily increase. In 1999, it was reported that K-State had 10,368 women enrolled in classes, only 807 less than the number of men.

The movement has also forced the extremely popular and sexist James Bond series to transform its one time incompetent and helpless Bond girls into women that are just as talented and intelligent as the cunning British superspy 007.

Although these are necessary steps toward absolute equality, without any further action in this direction, these steps merely cast a shadow over the remaining problems by maintaining the appearance of equality. After all, women and minorities still face impenetrable glass ceilings in many businesses and corporations, and those who do not, often receive less compensation than their peers for the same amount of work. Additionally, many minorities are still being economically forced to stay within the confines of slums and brownstones despite our country's recent economic boom.

Meanwhile, homosexuals are expected to stay confined within the closet — at least as far as our military is concerned. Those who do not will undoubtedly suffer the uneducated wrath of morons like Eminem.

On top of everything else, women are now expected to work as well as perform their traditional household duties — a.k.a. soccer moms.

In the past 10 years, these problems have only been made worse by policies like affirmative action that have resulted in what is often called "institutionalized discrimination." This discrimination arose from the quotas and proportions that have made affirmative action so controversial and ineffective.

The problem is that people don't know whether they were hired because they were the most qualified or if they simply met a quota. This often results in members of the majority screaming to high heaven about "reverse discrimination," while members of the minority feel as though they are nothing more than charity cases.

Individually, these problems pose little threat; however, together they are slowly unraveling the fabric of our country by creating more and more people who are closet racist and sexist. This unraveling is causing our nation to fragment into pockets of hate.

The time has come to break free of the chains binding our nation and to settle for nothing less than absolute equality. To do this, the civil rights movement must rise like the phoenix and provide the people with a way to bring our nation back together. Attention needs to be placed on the people who are trying to stop the wheels, rather than focusing it all on the Confederate battle flag and the swastika — people are the ones that hate, not symbols.

To accomplish this enormous task, we cannot afford to simply focus on civil rights and Martin Luther King Jr. for one or two weeks a year. They must be celebrated every minute of every day. Until we can stand together as one people and proudly proclaim that we are "one nation, under god," none of us are truly free.

ADAM HAYES/Collegian

Public transit not just needed by K-State

My best friend and I have a ritual. On the eve before all of our big tests we go to the only place in Manhattan where you can sit and study all hours of the night uninterrupted. It is the place where you can drink bottomless pots of coffee until your hands begin to shake: Village Inn Restaurant.

It was the beginning of the semester this time last year, and we were freaking out about our first test in a class. After much complaining, we began hours of comparing class notes, quizzing each other on our note cards, showing off our newfound anthropological knowledge and generally freaking out.

After a few hours, the pitchers of coffee emptied and our energy began to wane. We decided to have one more go with the note cards, then take off and get some much needed rest.

My partner-in-crime got up to use the restroom, and I tried with all my might to concentrate on the information. As I flipped through the note cards and imagined myself somewhere else, a man walked in.

He walked right past the hostess and cashier, stumbled over to a dirty table and sat down. Before I could register what was going on, he began shoveling down the leftover food. The stranger was sitting with his back toward me and although I could not see exactly what was happening, it was evident to a naive girl, like myself, he was hungry and homeless.

I sat mesmerized. After hovering down the leftovers on the table next to ours, he pulled a cigarette from his pocket. He sat there rolling the cigarette in his hands.

My friend returned to our table from the bathroom, and I was in a total state of shock. I wanted to tell her about the guy sitting behind her; I wanted to tell the manager; I wanted to jump on top of the table, wave my arms in the air and let every person know about what was happening right in front of our faces. How incredibly unjust it all was.

But I just sat there. I don't know why I had all of these crazy, indiscrete urges. Maybe it was all the caffeine. But all of that studying I had done all night just did not seem to matter anymore.

Finally, we left.

I walked my friend to her car and burst. I could not hold it any longer. I told her about the man and what I had seen and she smiled. She has this way of being patient and calm. She said she knew about the man, then laughed and said she could smell him. We stood talking about the options for the homeless in Manhattan for a while, then just stared at the ground.

MICHELLE BERTUGLIA

The night had peaked my curiosity. What were the options for the homeless in Manhattan? I mean, it's not like certain parts of Kansas City, Mo., where people walking the streets are prevalent. No, this is safe, small town America. So, I began to investigate.

I called the Manhattan Emergency Shelter and talked to Junell Norris, the executive director. She told me what the shelter provides. She said an average of 400-500 people stay in the shelter every year. That fact blew my mind.

She said the most common reasons why people need shelter in Manhattan are personal crisis, lost employment, domestic violence and relocation to the area. She said initially the shelter houses transient people for two days. For local residents who are actively looking to improve their situation, they can stay in the shelter for up to 14 days, but arrangements can be made for longer stays as well.

Norris said there are other options for the homeless besides the shelter. She said the American Red Cross offers some utility and rent assistance.

The Salvation Army offers some rental assistance and some free transportation. She said within the city of Manhattan there are six different public housing authority sites that work to make rent and utilities affordable.

Norris said the largest problem for the homeless is transportation.

There is none.

Norris said of the 428 people who stayed in the shelter last year, 83 percent did not have a vehicle. She said she has had to watch people walk, with children in hand, from the shelter to Seth Childs Road in terrible weather to pick up some of the basic necessities of life.

So, while we are spending all of this time working, trying to figure out exactly what transportation options are the best for us, I think it is important we don't forget those who need a busing/public transportation system more than we do.

Yes, it is looking like students will pay a large part of the starting costs. But, I think it is important that we demand more of the system than to get us to class and home safely from Aggieville.

As students, we need to play an active role and remind the city and the university there are those who need transportation even more desperately than we do. We have a chance. Why not do a real service and make sure there is access to the system for those who need it the most?

Understanding key to unity

By SHANNON MARSHALL
Kansas State Collegian

Christine McCoy wasn't used to being a curiosity.

The blond-haired, blue-eyed student traveled to Africa during her sophomore year at K-State, though, and the tables were turned.

McCoy

"I stepped out of my own comfort zone in Africa," she said. "I'd never been in a country where I was the minority. People there were curious, and they looked at us differently."

McCoy, senior in park and resource management, said the visit to Africa and her Introduction to Women's Studies and Cultural Anthropology classes peaked her interest in different cultures. She said it is understanding, not tolerance, that is important when working with people of various ethnic backgrounds.

"One of the main points I've gotten is that tolerance is not necessarily a good thing," she said. "Tolerance eventually rears its ugly head, and you need to learn to understand the backgrounds of others."

She said, as a white woman, she never has experienced racism, which makes understanding the difficulties of other cultures more of a challenge.

"I've probably seen racism firsthand, but not ever been a victim to it. Maybe that's why it's hard for me to completely understand when other people suffer racism because of their background, beliefs or religion," she said, "because I've never experienced it."

McCoy is from Augusta, Kan., a small town on the outskirts of Wichita. Of its 8,000 residents, McCoy said approximately 10 are of other cultural backgrounds. Her high school graduating class only had four students of other backgrounds.

"I wasn't as sensitive to those issues then as I am now," she said.

As a member of Kappa Alpha Theta sorority at K-State, McCoy was selected to represent her house in the American Ethnic Studies Student Association. Through this organization, she became chairwoman of Urban and Minority Recruitment for the Agriculture Ambassadors. Her position gave her the responsibility of working to bring minority students to K-State's College of Agriculture.

"I think agriculture is one of the least diversified majors on campus, and we try to bring minority students here and retain them here in our program," she said.

This wish for increased diversity is a passion of McCoy's.

"I like to surround myself and to be surrounded by people who are aware of other cultures, people who are able to communicate their needs and concerns effectively," she said.

Todd Nicewonger, graduate student in adult, occupational and continuing education, has worked extensively with McCoy on campus activities and described her as a dedicated individual.

"She is such a passionate, dedicated person," he said. "Not only does she work with the spirit of cooperation, but with willingness. She is so leadership-oriented and dedicated to what she is doing and advocating for change."

McCoy continues her dedication to diversity during Martin Luther King Jr. Observance Week. She said King's mission is one that should continue today.

"I hope people realize that Martin Luther King Jr. speaks on behalf of all cultures," she said. "The United States is not unique in its culture situation — Serbia and Croatia, for example — there have always been ethnic misunderstandings around the world. Part of understanding each other is understanding why we are different."

Lottery up for review; students speak out

Legislators will debate lottery renewal this July; views differ on its morality, revenue usage.

By AMY MORGAN
Kansas State Collegian

The Kansas Lottery is up for renewal in July 2002, but Kansas lawmakers want to know if they will be able to count on lottery revenues for government programs in the future.

The state of Kansas receives 30 percent of all lottery ticket sales, and funds are transferred into the State Gaming Revenues Fund.

The Kansas Legislature then decides how the money in the fund is distributed throughout the state.

The Kansas Lottery creates $60 million annually in revenue for the state. It funds economic development, prison construction, juvenile detention facilities and education.

Although the lottery doesn't expire until July 2002, lawmakers will decide this July if it will be renewed, since it takes one year to pay out prize money, phase out games and shutdown the lottery.

House Speaker Kent Glasscock, R-Manhattan, said he favors the renewal of the lottery for the state.

"Thirty-five to 40 state programs are funded by lottery money," Glasscock said. "Economic programs would be greatly affected by lottery revenue loss."

The reason some are opposed to the renewal, he said, is because of moral views.

"Some lawmakers are morally opposed to gaming like, the lottery," Glasscock said.

Many lawmakers object to how the money from the lottery is being used and want to change it, he said.

Senate majority leader Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, said she wants a clean renewal for the lottery. Oleen said Kansas Legislature has reviewed the lottery three times since it has opened.

"I personally chaired it twice. I have a different view because I carry the bill," she said.

Oleen said 47 percent of the lottery revenue goes to vocational and other forms of public education — like K-State.

Heather Pauly, senior in life science, plays Pick 4 and Powerball about three times a month for fun.

"I knew that they were considering shutting down the lottery from listening to the news," she said. "It is ridiculous because the state of Kansas makes lots of money off of it, and it would only hurt the state."

Jason Cline, junior in education, played Keno about once a week during the summer when taking his break from work.

Cline said he doesn't think the lottery should be shut down.

"You're not forced to play. It's your own choice," he said.

If Legislature votes to renew the Kansas Lottery it will not expire until 2012, since Legislature sets the date of expiration for the lottery.

"The Legislature makes sure the lottery is secure, and that it has the integrity and honesty it always has had," Oleen said.

Cats to battle Oklahoma

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

K-State might have caught Oklahoma at an inopportune time.

Despite the Cats (8-7, 2-2 Big 12) coming off an emotional upset of Missouri on Tuesday, the No. 21/22 Sooners (12-4, 1-3) are looking to simply get back in the winning column after dropping three of their last four games, including two straight.

"I think they've got to feel like their backs are against the wall and they've got to scratch, claw and fight their way back up again," K-State head coach Jim Wooldridge said. "I don't think they care really who they play. I think they're to the point right now that they could be playing Duke and they're going to come and give it an unbelievable effort. So, we just happened to be the first team in their way after their last loss at Texas Tech."

Yet, although Saturday might be a must-win situation for the Sooners, that's not to say K-State won't be hungry for its third victory over a ranked opponent this season, forward Matt Siebrandt said.

In addition to Tuesday's 80-59 trouncing of No. 20 Mizzou, Wooldridge's club also knocked off then-No. 19 Iowa 86-78 in late December.

"You should be ready to play for any team, but especially when they're coming into your house and they're ranked," Siebrandt said of the OU game. "You really get pumped up for that. It seems like that's how our team is — that we get more motivated for these ranked opponents."

Wooldridge said he feels that extra drive from his players in marquee ball games.

"I think kids are motivated and stimulated to play against people that they see on 'SportsCenter' all the time and ESPN and read about in the national magazines," he said.

"You have to be pretty non-caring not to be motivated to see individually how you stack up against the next guy in this league and how your team stacks up against their team."

"So, it's one of these games again that we'll have to take an identity of the underdog and play that role out thoroughly."

To play that role out, K-State might be forced to play against OU's 3-2 zone defense, though, Siebrandt said.

"Teams are figuring out that it's hard to guard our offense in man, so we're going to see a lot of zone and we've just got to get used to seeing that night-in and night-out," he said.

Defensively, on the other hand, the Cats will look to contain Oklahoma's leading scorer, Aaron McGhee, who posts 15.4 points per game on 61 percent shooting from three-point land. McGhee is one of four Sooners averaging double figures this season.

At any rate, Saturday's matchup will have special meaning for Cat transfer guard Larry Reid, a native of Midwest City, Okla.

"It's kind of exciting for me because my whole family gets to see me play on TV back there," Reid said. "I know there's a strong tradition at Oklahoma, and when I was growing up I wanted to be a part of that."

"But coming to K-State and playing against them, it could be even better to try and make a little competition out of it and make a little motivator for yourself."

Nevertheless, Siebrandt said the entire

K-State team will be confident and motivated, especially after its victory over the Tigers this week. However, being overconfident is definitely out of the question.

"We're supposed to finish 12th in the Big 12, so there's no way we can be cocky or anything," he said. "We just have to be confident in ourselves and know that we're playing good basketball right now and we can keep it up if we want to. It's totally up to us."

K-State gears up for Big 12 opponent

■ Women's team looks to build on Texas victory at away game against Missouri on Saturday.

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's trip to Columbia, Mo., on Saturday couldn't come at a better time.

Fresh off a 72-63 win over Texas on Wednesday, K-State (11-5, 1-4) goes into a conference game with momentum for the first time this season, something junior guard Kristin Rethman said helps in preparation.

"We just have to come out like we did (against Texas) — ready to play, executing and rebounding well," Rethman said. "We have to be ready to do it. We have to do what coach puts in our hands to do."

The 3 p.m. game will pit the Big 12's fifth-ranked scoring offense in Missouri (11-5, 2-3) against the conference's fifth-ranked scoring defense in the Cats.

What head coach Deb Patterson hopes to see from her team Saturday against the Tigers will be the same focus displayed by her veteran perimeter players against the Longhorns.

"Our team has begun to take the steps necessary to become a competitive ball club," Patterson said. "We have a victory, and every single day we need to continue to work to understand the necessity for that same focus, that same intensity every single game."

Increased focus on ball control and rebounding top Patterson's list of steps needed in order for K-State to have success in the remainder of conference play.

K-State lost the battle on the boards to the Longhorns on Wednesday night by a slim margin. The 20 offensive rebounds surrendered to Texas and the Cats' 37 turnovers in the past two games continue to be cause for concern among some players.

"We've got to keep our heads and take care of the basketball," senior guard Kim Woodlee said. "We have to continue to take care of the basketball and rebound."

Patterson said she is in better spirits following the team's first conference win of the year and is anxious to see how K-State responds to their next challenge.

"I'm feeling very positive," she said. "I think we could have folded tent after the KU game. I don't think we competed well, and certainly didn't play basketball well. To see that change (against Texas) should bring home the message to this ball club."

Individual tourney to kick off season of K-State tennis

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

This weekend's Georgia Invitational results won't show up in the win or loss column for the K-State tennis squad, but head coach Steve Bietau isn't denying the tournament's value.

In fact, the solely individual event, consisting of a 48-person singles draw and a 32 doubles draw, will feature several of the top programs in collegiate tennis. And opening the season against high-caliber competition such as host and 2nd-ranked Georgia, the defending national champions, will only make the Wildcats better, Bietau said.

"When you think about the two or three most elite places in women's college tennis, Georgia's right there," Bietau said. "It gives us a chance to get some serious competition for everyone before we start our team matches the next weekend."

"You don't call it a tune-up when you go and play matches against Georgia, but from a team standpoint, it gives everybody a real high level of live competition and just lets us figure out some of the pieces we're trying to put together for the team right now."

The Georgia Invitational, played at the Lindsey Hopkins Indoor Tennis Center in Athens, Ga., will be headlined by players from 11 different schools. Besides Georgia and No. 43 K-State, other universities with individuals in competition include No. 23 LSU, Kentucky, Mississippi State, Georgia Tech, Georgia Southern, Georgia State, Brenau, Armstrong Atlantic State and Illinois.

However, the talented field at the invitational isn't intimidating the Cats, senior Eva Novotna said. In fact, she's looking forward to an early test.

"I think it's really good to start up the season at this level because you kind of have to see how good you have to play to be the best team in the nation," she said. "So actually, I think it's a very good idea to go down there."

Junior Alena Jecminkova said she agreed, and said being an individual and not a team competition, K-State doesn't really have anything to lose.

"We just gain experience against really good teams," she said, "and if we want to get to nationals, that's the kind of tournament we have to play good matches in."

Besides, it's not like the Cats aren't used to facing stiff competition in the Big 12 Conference, Bietau said.

"We play Texas every year, so it's not like we haven't seen good tennis," he said. "Let's put it this way, we'll go down there with the idea of competing and winning some matches."

Bietau, the 2000 Big 12 Coach of the Year, will send sophomore Petra Sedlmajerova, freshman Paulina Castillejos and newcomer Hayley McIver, as well as Novotna and Jecminkova, to Georgia this weekend, with matches running through Monday.

So far, Bietau said he's pleased with the way his squad looks heading into spring competition.

"The players have responded very well in practice so far," he said. "The intensity level has been good. I feel like their minds have been open, and they simply came back from break, ready to play."

K-State heads into the spring campaign looking to build off a 14-9 record last season, the most wins by a Cat squad since 1990, while returning five of seven letter winners after finishing last spring with a school-best 7-4 conference mark.

Track team prepares for home competition

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

Despite slogging through high-intensity workouts, K-State's track and field athletes still chalked up noteworthy times and distances in last weekend's meet.

Starting today and continuing into Saturday, they will have the chance to do so again as K-State will be host to the Wildcat Invitational and Wildcat Heptathlon/Pentathlon, its second consecutive home meet in Ahearn Field House.

This weekend, the spotlight will be on several younger athletes who have been able to improve their marks while enduring extreme physical training.

Sophomore middle distance runner, Nicole Grose, for instance, placed second in the 600 meters with a time of 1:25:85.

"Nicole's performance showed she's way ahead of where she was at the same time last year," middle distance coach Randy Cole said. "She's really been training very physical and very well, so it's going to be pretty exciting to see what she's going to be able to do, coming out of the blocks, so to speak."

In addition to Grose, Amanda Crouse, Korene Hinds and Amy

Mortimer also will take the track with high expectations. The middle distance trio helped the cross country team to a 10th-place finish in the NCAA Championships this fall and are improving.

"They're already ahead from the fall cross country," Cole said. "They're way ahead of where they were a year ago."

In the field events, pole vaulter Jim Gruenbacher jumped for a personal best at last weekend's meet, and freshman shot putter Rebekah Green's NCAA qualifying mark of 52-11 already has ensured for her a remarkable season.

"If she just maintains the level she's at, if she doesn't improve," head coach Cliff Rovelto said, "it will still be a successful season."

Dressing for success makes possible difference in basketball performances

It must be the jeans.

As an underestimated and often underappreciated Collegian sports writer (not to mention, underpaid), I've usually taken desperate measures to try and earn an inkling of stature and respect from my journalistic peers.

I'd figure the more I dress up for football and basketball games, the more professional I'd look and the less of those dreaded he's-just-a-stupid-Collegian-reporter stares I'd receive. Heck, I went as far as wearing a suit to the K-State/Nebraska football game this year (and believe me, it sure helped my writing tremendously.

On Tuesday night, I felt a casual recognition sweep over me.

I decided not to care about my (lack of) reputation and not feel the stares. I was prepared to cross the little white line of professionalism I drew for myself.

No slacks. No tucked in shirt and tie. None of that crap — I wore jeans (I was out there, my friends, and it felt terrific).

And better yet — we won. K-State upset No. 20 Missouri, a game in which nearly everyone had counted the Cats out before the opening tip. Now, I wasn't going to go and brag or anything — I figured I'd just try my luck Wednesday as well, and just make sure my casual jean-wearing incident wasn't a fluke.

It wasn't. The K-State women also pulled an upset, a 72-63 win over No. 17 Texas.

So, needless to say, I started to get a pretty big head. After all, I could start my own private business, charging the basketball programs money for me to sit on the sidelines in my jeans and smile. Or I could pop my balloon of arrogance and stupidity and get to the real point.

Let's go with the latter.

Regardless of my attire this week, there seemed to be a considerable amount of magic floating around Bramlage Coliseum ... and it had nothing to do with "Crunch," the Minnesota Timberwolves' mascot, in attendance. I'm putting my foot down on that one.

Anyway, it was no doubt great to see both the men's and women's squads performing at such a high level, especially against ranked conference opponents.

But the question still remains — where will they go from here?

The men might catch Oklahoma at a particularly difficult time this Saturday. The Sooners are amid a heap of struggles, and they look especially hungry for vengeance.

Plus, if they play a zone defense on the Cats, as expected, we'll have to see which Jim Wooldridge team comes to play — the one that hit from everywhere on the court against Mizzou, or the squad that did some shoddy masonry work versus Baylor.

On the women's side, Deb Patterson's team will have to take their momentum on the road to Columbia, Mo. — not the easiest venue to steal a victory from, to say the least. And if the tandem of Kim Woodlee and Kristin Rethman stays hot from beyond the arc, K-State could pick up its second conference win of the season.

All-in-all, both teams have a lot left to prove in 2001, and all we can do is let them tackle the challenge head on.

I still think I'll stick to the jeans, though.

Reviving the blues

Famous Delta blues singer will perform Saturday at McCain Auditorium in honor of Martin Luther King Jr. Week

By BETSY STYERAK
Kansas State Collegian

Bringing back to life the women of the Mississippi Delta, a jazz vocalist appearing at McCain Auditorium will attempt to reproduce the Delta sound in her own style.

Memphis jazz vocalist Joyce Cobb's appearance coincides with Martin Luther King Jr. activities on campus and takes place 8 p.m. Saturday. Cobb covers works from early female blues and jazz singers that were developed in the Delta area, she said.

"I grew up in a home where be-bop records were always playing," she said. "So, I was influenced by some of the great jazz vocalists like Billie Holiday and Ella Fitzgerald."

Cobb takes the audience through the story of how music developed from the churches to the streets, she said. In spite of the racial conflicts, great music was found from the Delta area from both black and white people. She will be joined on stage by a five-piece ensemble band.

Cobb recently finished the "Beale Street Saturday Night Tour", where she performed a number of blues songs, touring with other performers. The show being brought to McCain Auditorium is an extension of that tour.

Thom Jackson, marketing and development officer of McCain, said he is enthusiastic about Cobb's performance.

"This show is different from what was origi-

"This show is different from what was originally seen on the tour. People in the Manhattan community that are interested in blues and jazz should definitely check this out."

— Thom Jackson, marketing and development officer of McCain, nally seen on the tour," he said. "People in the Manhattan community that are interested in blues and jazz should definitely check this out."

Ben Hohly, freshman in fisheries and wildlife biology, said he is a huge fan of this type of music and awaits Cobb's performance. Hohly plays blues and jazz the tenor saxophone and said because of that, the show is especially pertinent to him.

"As a musician, an important reason to listen to blues and jazz artists is so you can expand your own musicality," he said.

Expanding her musical horizons has been a motivating factor throughout her life, Cobb said. Born in Okmulgee, Okla., Cobb said she soon moved and grew up in a variety of areas including Tallahassee, Fla., and Nashville. She went to college at Central State in Wilberforce, Ohio, where she received her bachelor's degree.

Though Cobb was inspired strongly by the blues and jazz genres, she said she received her first record contract as a country-western singer. Stax Records signed her in 1976, but they soon went bankrupt, leaving her without a record label.

Cobb became more heavily influenced by blues and jazz and made it her priority to focus on this type of music. In 1980, she was signed as a blues and jazz artist for Shoe Productions where she released several recordings.

Her first released song, "I Dig the Gold", is about the situation of cheap labor among African-Americans digging in the gold mines and made it to number 42 on the Billboard chart, she said. At the end of the day, the workers returned to their poor shanty houses asking, "Where does the gold go?" Cobb said.

In the late 1980s, Cobb's publicity earned her the honor of having a club named after her. The club catered to Memphis, Tenn., local acts featuring all kinds of music. Unfortunately, in the early '90s, the club was closed. Now, Cobb is performing the music she loves on the road. She said she hopes she helps people realize how much influence the Delta style has had on American music.

"I want people to leave knowing every form of American music originated in the Delta," she said. "Blues, jazz, rhythm and blues and a little bit of rock 'n' roll all developed in the cradle of the Delta."

Duo brings electric interplay to BirdHouse

The potential to be a singer, songwriter is something Darrell Scott always knew he had in his blood.

Playing music as early as age 6 and writing music at age 12, Scott knew music would always be a part of his life.

"I grew up in a musical family," he said. "It was second nature for me to grab an instrument and play along."

Manhattan will be getting a taste of his musical talent as he teams up with Tim O'Brien to bring an eclectic concert to the Manhattan Arts Center at 8 p.m. Saturday as part of the BirdHouse Acoustic Music Series.

However, the concert will be a surprise not only for his audience, but also for Scott.

"We never have a set list," Scott said. "We never know what we're going to do. It keeps us fresh and on our toes. It wouldn't surprise me if Tim springs a song I've never heard before."

Nevertheless, he assures the concert will be entertaining and relaxing.

"It'll be a real diverse musical night under the umbrella of two guys playing off each other as if we were playing in our own home," he said. "We try to take that comfort to the stage."

Playing in their own home isn't uncommon to the duo. After playing together for 3 years, Scott and O'Brien recorded their album "Real Time" in Scott's home.

Both members of the duo have led lives filled with music.

O'Brien was a member of the band "Hot Rize" that was the top bluegrass band in America for a number of years, David Kamerer, co-founder of BirdHouse, said. O'Brien also has written songs that have been performed by top music artists.

"He's really getting noticed around Nashville as a songwriter," Kamerer said. "He just really understands music and is an engaging performer."

After working for a number of years in the music business, Scott said that while playing and performing songs are perks of his job, what he really enjoys is the self-expression that lends itself to music.

He finds this expression in songwriting.

"I like songs more than anything," he said. "It's what you can say in a song that I'm really interested in. Songs are literature. Songs are poetry."

Not only are Scott and O'Brien's songs used for their own expression, but they have also written songs that have been performed by other artists.

Their most popular recent songs include "When No One's Around", performed by Garth Brooks, "Heartbreak Town", performed by the Dixie Chicks and "It's a Great Day to Be Alive", performed by Travis Tritt.

"It's another part of what we do, but it's not divorced from what we do," Scott said. "We sing our songs more than anything. It's basically a miracle to get a song you've written come out as a No. 1 by someone else."

Manhattan will get a taste of these songs and more as the duo travels to Manhattan Arts Center this weekend.

Steve Martini, co-producer of the BirdHouse series, said he looks forward to Saturday's performance.

"They are really good performers and musicians," he said. "We are fortunate to have them. It's great to get somebody at the top of their field in Manhattan."

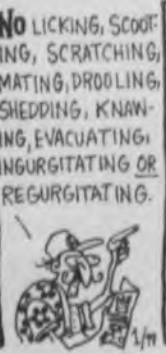

Kamerer agreed.

"What I love is the interplay between two good musicians," he said. "One plus one suddenly equals three."

Kamerer said he expects the concert to be entertaining.

"I expect these guys to come out with both barrels with lots of firepower and really light up the stage."

the many protesters expected this year.

"I'll be watching, but mainly because of the protests," Jonas Stewart, senior in political science, said. "Also, because I've invested some of my time campaigning for Gore, and I need to see it through."

Stewart said he is disappointed with the way the election turned out, and feels the country is not instating a president-elect, but a president-adjudicate.

However, there are a few students who said they feel the inauguration is a historical event and will be watching solely because of its importance to the country.

"I'm excited to see it because it's a neat event that only happens once every four years," Jake Worcester, student body president, said. "I've always had a real interest in government and public service, and I think it's important that people take an active role in government."

Worcester said he hasn't heard many people talking about the actual inauguration and feels people won't be watching because the inauguration isn't something people think they get a lot from.

"People tend not to get an education from it," he said. "It's just ceremonial."

Even though it seems most students are more interested in the recent election, some did say the inauguration should be recognized as a significant event.

"I do think it's important, and I don't think enough people care, but that shouldn't make it any less important," said Brianne Dusen, senior in accounting and finance. "We may have a flawed political system, but we're getting a new president."

Others said the inauguration was important to them because it's a time for closure and uniting as one nation.

"It's the future of our country," Ashley Ryan, senior in elementary education, said. "The last few months have been a trying time for the country, and it's a good time for everyone to come together."

Others expressed different concerns.

"It's become too political," said Jennifer Witt, senior in biology. "It's not about the people anymore."

TEACHER

every day that I was doing a fine job, but when evaluations came around, she said I had lots of faults. When I asked her why, she did not tell me about them. When I asked, she replied that it was not her job."

Wilkerson said that in another student teaching experience, he felt tension with the teacher.

"She taught the kids with overhead projections, and I just did not like to teach like that," Wilkerson said. "When I brought it up to her, she said that I wasn't listening to her because she was a white female. She even tried to give me an 'F' on my mid-term evaluation. I had been working with an autistic child in the class, and in all the other evaluations, she said I was doing a great job. I just did not understand how that could change in such a short period of time."

Wilkerson went on to teach kindergarten in Cincinnati when he graduated from the University of Kentucky. After a year of teaching, Wilkerson said he knew he wanted more, so he came to graduate school at K-State.

"Coming here was really different," Wilkerson said. "When people ask me if I think K-State is diverse, I have to say no. I came from a university that was historically black and grew up in a large city. There are just so many people here that come from small towns and have only seen African American people on TV or in magazines and movies."

Wilkerson said that despite the low population of black students on campus, he feels as though K-State has a lot to offer him and he has a lot to offer to the university.

"I have a lot to learn from everyone here," Wilkerson said. "Not only the professors and teachers, but also the students. I also have a lot to teach people. I spoke to some freshman leadership classes last semester, and I think it gave me a great opportunity to give those students a positive example of an African-American male in a position of leadership."

Candi Pitts, associate director of leadership studies and programs, said she has worked with Wilkerson and sees just how much he reaches out to all people.

"Lovell has energy, vision and a big heart," she said. "He is someone who inspires people to reach for the best they can be."

Wilkerson said he has been discriminated against, but has always remembered that all experiences make him stronger in the end.

"Everything is brought about by understanding," Wilkerson said. "Some people place their problems onto others, and I believe that is the heart of racism. Having a problem with yourself is what causes people to become racist against another group. Understanding yourself is the first step to understanding all other kinds of people."

Jackson admits to having illegitimate child

By SONYA ROSS
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Civil rights activist Jesse Jackson revealed Thursday that he had an extramarital affair that resulted in the birth of a daughter. "I fully accept responsibility and I am truly sorry for my actions," he said.

Jackson, a Baptist minister and one-time aide to Martin Luther King Jr., issued a statement admitting that he fathered the child, now 20 months old, and has provided emotional and financial support since her birth. "As her mother does,

I love this child very much," he said.

"I was born of these circumstances, and I know the importance of growing up in a nurturing, supportive and protected environment," Jackson said. "So I am determined to give my daughter and her mother the privacy they both deserve."

The civil rights leader said he would be stepping aside temporarily from his public life.

Jackson did not say why he issued the statement. His New York-based spokesman, John Scanlon, later said that Jackson acted to get out in front of anticipated tabloid reports about the child, who Scanlon said was the result of an affair Jackson had with a woman who worked in the Washington office of Jackson's advocacy group, the Rainbow-PUSH Coalition.

"He's obviously concerned for his family, for his child and the child's mother," Scanlon said.

The story was first reported by the National Enquirer.

"This is no time for evasions, denials or alibis," Jackson's statement said. "No doubt, many close friends and supporters will be disappointed in me. I ask for their forgiveness, understanding and prayers."

Jackson was a steadfast presence at President Clinton's side as the president struggled with the public revelation of his affair with Monica Lewinsky and the impeachment proceedings that followed. He went to the White House to pray with Clinton's family on a grim weekend in August 1998, as Clinton admitted the truth to his wife and daughter and, in a nationally televised speech, to the nation. The child reportedly is 20 months old, meaning she could have been conceived as early as July 1998 — a month before his visit with president.

Shootout leaves 1 dead, 2 injured

By BRYAN SCRIBNER
Kansas State Collegian

Gunfire early Sunday morning at the Fraternal Order of the Eagles club, 312 S. Fourth St., left one dead and two injured.

Isabel Amaya, 19, sophomore in microbiology and Spanish, was one of the injured victims. According to a Riley County Police Department press release, Amaya suffered a gun shot wound to her left arm. She was admitted to Mercy Health Center on College Avenue. Mercy would not comment on Amaya's condition.

According to a K-State media relations press release, Amaya was attending a party sponsored by two K-State organizations.

The gunfight occurred at approximately 2:01 a.m., according to the police department press release. James Hawthorne, 4-1 Field Artillery, Fort Riley, and a passenger, who was also a member of the Army, were fired upon in their 1995 Honda, which resulted in the death of the passenger. Hawthorne suffered a gun shot wound to his leg.

The passenger's identity will not be released until family members are contacted, according to the release. An autopsy was performed on the victim Sunday. The Yorgensen-Meloan-Londeen Funeral Home will be providing arrangements.

Two unidentified women embrace as the victim of a shooting is taken from the Fraternal Order of the Eagles club at 312 S. Fourth St. in Manhattan early Sunday morning. The shooting, which occurred around 2 a.m., left a female victim with non-critical injuries, according to Riley County Police Sgt. Steve Boyda. Boyda declined to give any further information.

Fraternity evaluates fire safety, wiring

By AMY MORGAN
Kansas State Collegian

The smoke has cleared, and Pi Kappa Alpha members now have to re-evaluate their future safety.

City Fire Marshall Don Francis confirmed the fire that occurred Wednesday night at Pi Kappa Alpha fraternity, 2021 College View Road, was due to improper wiring, as an existing outlet was spliced to create additional outlets in the house.

Francis said those wires were stapled to the wall and ran through a closet, where they ignited clothing when the circuit overloaded and overheated.

Justin Myers, president of Pike and junior in sociology, said it would take three weeks to a month to repair the damage from the fire.

Myers said that in addition to the room that was destroyed, a room next to it was partially destroyed.

Telefund kicks off at Salina

By TELISA NEW
Kansas State Collegian

Crammed into a room filled with food, games, prizes and lots of telephones, K-State-Salina's student volunteers began K-State's annual Telefund Sunday.

Sponsored by the KSU Foundation, this year's theme is "2001 - A Telephone Odyssey."

This year marks the 22nd year for the telefund, striving to achieve a goal of at least $1,234,567.

The Telefund will begin Feb. 4 in Manhattan and end March 5. K-State Manhattan students are asked to sign up in the dean's office of their particular college.

Giveaways such as a 2000 Dodge Neon, 66 gallons of free gas, a $1,000 scholarship and $500 parent scholarships all attribute to increasing

Full classes cause of setbacks

By NICK BRATKOVIC
Kansas State Collegian

In the world of enrollment, K-State students are finding the process to be a little like musical chairs, facing the challenge of being left standing when the music stops and all the chairs are full.

Closed classes can pose a problem for K-State students attempting to sort through the enrollment process.

Steve English, sophomore in business administration, has experienced the problem of not getting into a class. He is taking general requirements after experiencing difficulty getting into an accounting course.

"I am just taking a lot of the basic stuff right now," he said. "I couldn't get into one of the accounting classes I needed for accounting."

English said he would most likely take the course this summer and is now taking a lighter course load.

"I am only taking 12 hours this semester because of that class I couldn't get into," he said. "There is no point in taking a class I don't really need."

KAREN MIKOLIS/Collegian

Josh Zink, junior in anthropology, checks levels in the maintenance room in Boyd Hall Friday night. Zink is one of the eight student service technicians for the Department of Housing and Dining Services. He works all night Fridays and Saturdays, repairing elevators and cleaning up messes. Zink makes his nightly rounds in the basement of Putnam Hall. He checks the boiler rooms to ensure everything is operating smoothly.

LATE SHIFT

Student experiences variety of duties as housing maintenance worker

By MICHELLE BERTUGLIA
Kansas State Collegian

The phone rings at 6:15 p.m. Josh Zink, student service technician for Housing and Dining Services and junior in anthropology, stops checking gauge levels in the Derby Dining Center mechanical room and dashes out into the quiet hallway to answer the phone.

"Evening, Housing Maintenance, this is Josh," Zink said.

Every Friday and Saturday, Zink works from 4 p.m. to midnight, then works on-call from midnight to 8 a.m. for Housing and Dining Services as a student service technician. If there are any problems in any of the 10 residence halls on the weekends, Zink is the person they call.

Randy Plaff, facilities maintenance supervisor, said they usually have eight students on staff. He said each student has a night shift and an on-call shift, then works eight hours during the week furthering their skills.

Zink has worked for housing maintenance for a year. He said when he first started the job, he had visions of playing the gallant knight.

"When I first got the job I thought it was really cool," Zink said. "I could be the knight in shining armor, opening the elevator door to save the damsel in distress. Now that has faded."

Zink said he took the job because he understands maintenance and the mindset behind it, buy mostly he likes working at night.

"At night, I am all by myself," Zink said. "So, within limits, I have free reign over what I do. At night, I am my own boss."

When working at night, Zink said the student service technicians go on rounds checking the levels in the maintenance rooms, answering any service calls and doing extra work around the shop.

As student service technicians — or troubleshooters — they have to deal with things from biohazards to fixing broken elevators. Zink said cleaning up biohazards is not as bad as everyone thinks.

"Yeah, they are smelly and gross," Zink said. "But they are just part of the job."

I personally think toilets are much worse. When you raw 50 feet of pipe and pull out 20 feet of crud, that is pretty gross."

Zink said on the weekend, Moore and Haymaker halls call him quite a bit.

"I think they have a running tally on who calls the most," Zink said with a laugh.

Jason Klein, community assistant at

CAMPUS after dark

Editor's note: This story is the first of a Collegian series featuring daily articles about the people who work and study on campus after dark.

Moore Hall and junior in psychology, said Zink is called about two times a night on the weekends. Klein said they usually need Zink to deal with biohazards and broken-down elevators. Klein said Zink always is good-natured about coming in.

"He is cool, quiet and always really nice," Klein said, "even when he comes in at 4 a.m. to clean up biohazards."

Sometimes being the only one in charge of 10 residence halls can become stressful, Zink said.

"When you are backed up on calls two or three right in a row, you know it will be a rough night," Zink said. "Those are the nights we work full shifts and then until 2 or 3 a.m."

Zink said he sometimes equates himself to the "Wolf." The "Wolf" is a character in "Pulp Fiction" who goes in and cleans up the mess of the hit men after an extremely messy hit.

Vet discusses animal genetics, reproduction

Preserving the genetics of animals in captivity to help the survival of different populations in the wild was the focus for Rebecca Spindler's presentation "Real World Science: The Application of Conservation."

As part of a new partnership between K-State's College of Veterinary Medicine and the Smithsonian Institution, Spindler spoke Friday about her reproductive work with exotic cats and pandas. She discussed several reproductive techniques for captive animals presently being studied.

Gamete rescue, being researched in domestic cats, is being used to preserve the genetics of animals that may unexpectedly die or have not had the chance to breed. When a genetically valuable endangered or threatened animal dies, the ovaries or testicles are harvested from that animal and sent to a gamete lab. In the lab, the eggs or sperm are removed. The sperm may be frozen or used and the eggs are matured or fertilized.

"If we can develop a method to transfer these genes out into the wild to females whose bodies are primed for conception and release them into the wild pregnant, we eliminate a lot of different problems," Spindler said.

Last year Spindler went to China for a month to help complete a three-year biomedical survey on the Giant Panda as part of the National Zoo. They looked at the health assessment, diet, genetics, reproduction and behavior of the animal.

Recently the National Zoo has received two new pandas to further study the reproduction of the Giant Panda. The hope is to increase the number in the wild and to improve the breeding of those pandas in captivity in China and the United States.

The Exotic Animal Medicine Club sponsored Spindler's speech. President and second-year veterinary student Stasia Bembek said the presentation was an opportunity for veterinary students to see how they can get involved in the efforts of conservation.

"It was a chance to see how applied science and veterinary medicine combine," Bembek said. "We were able to see what is being done to help endangered species and the many opportunities available to veterinary medicine."

As part of this ongoing program between K-State and the Smithsonian Institution, K-State veterinary students have the opportunity to work on their masters research at the Smithsonian Institution Conservation and Research Center in Front Royal, Va.

Copper Aiken-Palmer, second year veterinary student, has been spending summers researching sperm metabolism in domesticated cats as a way to determine if the sperm samples would be good for artificial insemination.

"When you think of K-State you don't usually think of international conservation," Aiken-Palmer said. "Hopefully this partnership will get people thinking that way."

"Because, when we started out, the focus was more individual, it didn't cost a lot," Allen said.

Elementary school students explore Beach art museum

By April Middleton
Kansas State Collegian

As a fifth-grader, Kristopher Catoe has been places no one else has ever seen. It isn't difficult for him to find these places when he's only two inches tall. Creativity and imagination don't hurt, either.

After viewing paintings and sculptures at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art, Catoe and his peers were told to pretend they were only two inches tall and could jump into any piece of art they liked. They wrote about what they saw, heard and smelled. Then they got to draw it. "I get it (drawing) from my mom. She's an artist," said Catoe, a student at Ogden Elementary School, said. "I've been to the museum a lot, and I like to look at all the paintings and then go see what I can draw."

Ogden Students are invited to tour the Beach art museum and take part in an art project once each semester. These visits are one of many activities that take place as part of a collaboration between the Beach art museum and Ogden Elementary.

The collaboration began years ago and has been recognized by the U.S. Department of Education. The department cited Beach art museum-sponsored activities at the school's Ogden Community Learning Center as one of the five exemplary programs in the nation.

The Ogden Community Learning Center was made possible through a "21st Century Community Learning Center" grant from the Department of Education.

The Beach art museum also provides summer and extracurricular activities at the Ogden school.

Barb Tierney, Ogden school principal, said the unique thing about the collaboration is that it has been long-standing, and every student in the school tours the Beach art museum each semester.

"It's a great thing for our students to have this opportunity," Tierney said. "It provides the kids with access to see things they don't experience every day."

Katherine Schlageck, education and public services supervisor at Beach art museum, said this collaboration helps nurture an appreciation of art. She said it also allows students to use skills.

Children are asked to use problem-solving and critical-thinking skills. Schlageck said it helps to improve their higher order thinking skills.

"Programs and projects like these allow kids to use their imaginations. They get to be creative and improve necessary skills all at the same time," Schlageck said. "It's just amazing how beneficial the arts are to them."

Tierney said art also is important for children because it gives them another way by which to express themselves.

"Children love to draw," Tierney said. "If they don't have the verbal or written skills to express themselves, they need other avenues."

Tierney said the collaboration with the Beach art museum gives students the knowledge and appreciation of art to express themselves artistically.

Manhattan offers variety of historical sites open to public

By Stefanie Howard
Kansas State Collegian

Taking a step back into time is easy in Manhattan, where there are six historical museums and houses with Riley County history.

These historical sites include the Riley County Historical Museum, the Goodnow House Museum, the Wolf House Museum, Pioneer Log Cabin, Rocky Ford School, the Hartford House and the Randolph Jail.

The Riley County Historical Museum, 2309 Claflin Road, is open free to the public from 8:30 a.m. to 5 p.m. Tuesday through Friday and 2 p.m. to 5 p.m. Saturday and Sunday. The museum's emphasis is on Riley County history. Standing exhibits include the Household Work Week, which showcases the daily activities and chores of Riley County residents between 1855 and 1950. The exhibit explains the chores of the past and what days they were assigned to be completed.

Linda Glasgow, volunteer coordinator at the museum, said the machines used for chores displayed in the exhibit are primitive systems progressing throughout the mid 1950s.

Another exhibit, one that has traveled all over Kansas, is the "Land Grant Ladies: Kansas State University Presidential Wives." Artifacts, mementos, dresses and other souvenirs from the past 12 first ladies of K-State are on display.

Also located in the museum is a research library with archives of local history material. Visitors and others are able to research at the library, which is available upon reservation.

Jeanne Mithen, librarian and archivist at the museum, said the museum and its relationship with the community and college is close.

"We work closely with the education department, helping students find information for lesson plans, and we also work a lot with the history department at K-State," she said.

Located next door to the Riley County Historical Museum is the Goodnow House Museum — the historic stone home of Isaac and Ellen Goodnow. Goodnow was the first elected superintendent of Public Instruction for the state of Kansas. The home contains some of the original furnishings and documents from when the couple resided there. It is open for tours during most of the Riley County Historical Museum's times or by appointment.

The Wolf House Museum, 630 Fremont, is open free to the public from 1 p.m. to 5 p.m. Saturdays, 2 p.m. to 5 p.m. Sundays and by appointment. The house was built in 1868 and was a boarding house. It was a private residence before being donated by Lucile Wolf in 1982 to the Riley County Historical Society.

Some of the boarders at the house were college professors, students and even the president of the Kansas State Agricultural College. When K.S.A.C. President George Fairchild's house was struck by lightning and burnt down in 1895, he and his family stayed there. The house is set up for the exhibit "Life at the Turn of the Century: 1900 Revisited." The house is furnished as it was believed to be in the 1900s, and the exhibit runs through January 2002.

Other historical sites around Manhattan include the Randolph Jail and the Hartford House, a prefabricated house that came to Manhattan on an 1855 steamboat. There also is the Pioneer Log Cabin, which was Riley County Historical Society's first museum. It is located in City Park and is open from 2 p.m. to 5 p.m. Sundays between April and October. The log cabin home includes an agricultural tool exhibit. The Rocky Ford School, on Barnes Road and Tuttle Creek Boulevard, is a 1903 stone one-room schoolhouse and is available by appointment.

Preparation, communication needed in cuts

Due to high energy costs K-State now has to figure out a way to cut $1.5 million from its budget.

This will equal 1-2 percent cuts across the board. But where does it end?

The future of the budget cuts reside in the hands of the deans.

They need to remember to talk to professors, faculty members and especially students to help determine where to make the cuts. For the most part they shouldn't just cut where they see fit.

K-State officials should have been more prepared for this. For months it has been made apparent that energy costs would increase.

Other areas have been affected due to the lack of planning in terms of the state leaders. The state made its budget way too tight without thinking of possible situations, such as increased heating costs.

Governor Graves had previously announced a 7.5-percent increase in entry-level pay for civil service employees. Yet how, or if, this funding will actually occur is still up in the air.

However, the majority of those who are directly involved with K-State more likely will be affected by the lack of planning. Cutting $1.5 million out of the budget is a larger issue than meets the eye.

This budget cut may not have been prevented, but it could have been smaller if everyone was more prepared.

The Collegian's Campus Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on topics relevant to the publication.

Quit picking on our Joe Joe. We love him.

Why is it my neighbors get so shocked and shattered when we have a party? What did they expect when they bought a house seven blocks from campus and a block from a fraternity house?

Every time I watch the movie "The Natural" or "Field of Dreams" it makes me sad because it reminds me of a time when baseball was played for the love of the game. Today it's a business ruined by greed. Whatever happened to that age of innocence?

I just got a new K-State ID yesterday. They used my original picture and my original signature — that they took three years ago. Does it bother anybody else that they keep this information?

I sure am glad that Jesse Jackson is the moral leader of our country.

The Senate wants to make advisers more accountable, but they should be really trying to make students more accountable. Many students blame advisers when they should be blaming themselves. KSU publishes a handbook which any student should be able to read without an adviser and figure the classes they need to graduate instead of blaming advisers for incorrect classes.

I just wanted to let the Student of Financial Assistance know that, "I don't know," is not a good answer when your check is not ready.

The only reason that I'm on academic probation is because they wouldn't shut those damn jack hammers off last semester.

Question for Tuesday: How should K-State conserve energy?

OPINION

seize the DAY

Columnist reflects on death of friend; continues living

In all honesty, when I was hired this semester by the Collegian as an opinion columnist, I never dreamed that I would write a column addressing an issue as serious, cliché or tiresome as losing a loved one.

At this point in our lives, it is not uncommon to have lost a friend or a relative and anybody who has ever been struck by this type of tragedy understands the ramifications of personal grief and turmoil. That is why I wanted to devote this column to lesser, lighter and more uplifting topics.

However, when I was awakened at 4 a.m. last Monday and told that one of my closest friends had inexplicably and unexpectedly ended his own life, I was suddenly slapped in the face by the memories and sheer reality of the angst that embodies such situations.

And, while this column may sound like a personal plight, or a therapeutic release of emotions, I honestly do not feel that I can write about anything else; for presently my mind, and all my thoughts there encompassed, are consumed only by this event. And, hopefully, although my inspiration is initially derived from personal experience, all people can relate to the heart of the grieving.

Life is precious... a lesson that has been instilled in us since the beginning of time. "Live for today!" "Be thankful!" "Count your blessings!" "Seize the day!" Seize the day, seize the day. And for the most part we want to. We want to live our lives to the fullest. We want to appreciate everyone and everything that contributes to the intricate tapestry of life.

But you know what? Sometimes we get busy. And I mean really busy. As college students we are struggling to find that happy medium between childhood and adulthood.

We are struggling to go to work, go to school, go to parties, do our homework, get our exercise, eat our vegetables, figure out what we want to do with the rest of our lives, pay our rent, and yes, sleep. More often than not, seizing the day sounds like an unrealistic option.

Who has time to stop and smell the flowers or notice falling leaves when you are already 10 minutes late for class? And I can only bet that the last sunrise you were awake for happened somewhere between chapters six and eight as you were cramming for a difficult final. Seize the day? Seize the day? Seize a granola bar and head for the library, that sounds more like it.

But you know, if you live long enough without taking time to notice the people and the beauty all around you, sometimes they will simply slip right out of your life, forever.

And that is when the day seizes you. Right now I am being seized by the day. Or perhaps I am being seized by the hurt, or the fear, or the anger, or the confusion or the sudden empty hole right in the middle of my heart.

At any rate, at 4 a.m. last Monday, I was grabbed, I was held, I was shaken, I was taken captive... I was seized by emotions so powerful that I still cannot rid myself of them. I was seized by the day. And for those of you experienced in the area of grieving, you know that these feelings will last for a long, long time.

There is nothing I wouldn't give right now in order to go back in time and seize a final moment with him... take the time to watch his eyes wrinkle when he laughs or enjoy the sound of his smooth, even voice, laugh at his dumb jokes, or just put my arm around him and tell him I care about him. Because, I don't think I ever told him that. I always just assumed that there would be another day. "See you tomorrow," I said instead. See you tomorrow.

Now there are no more tomorrows for him. No more chances. No more moments. But there are tomorrows for the rest of us.

Even though my heart is breaking with sadness and my breathing at times is made difficult with sorrow and regret, I know that life is continuing. Walking around campus and seeing people laughing and smiling reminds me that life is continuing.

The cold winter wind freezing the tips of my ears reminds me that life is continuing. The desperate hugs of my friends, although triggered by unexpressible pain, reminds me that life is continuing.

Today is a new day, and tomorrow and the next. Seize those days, don't let them go — ever.

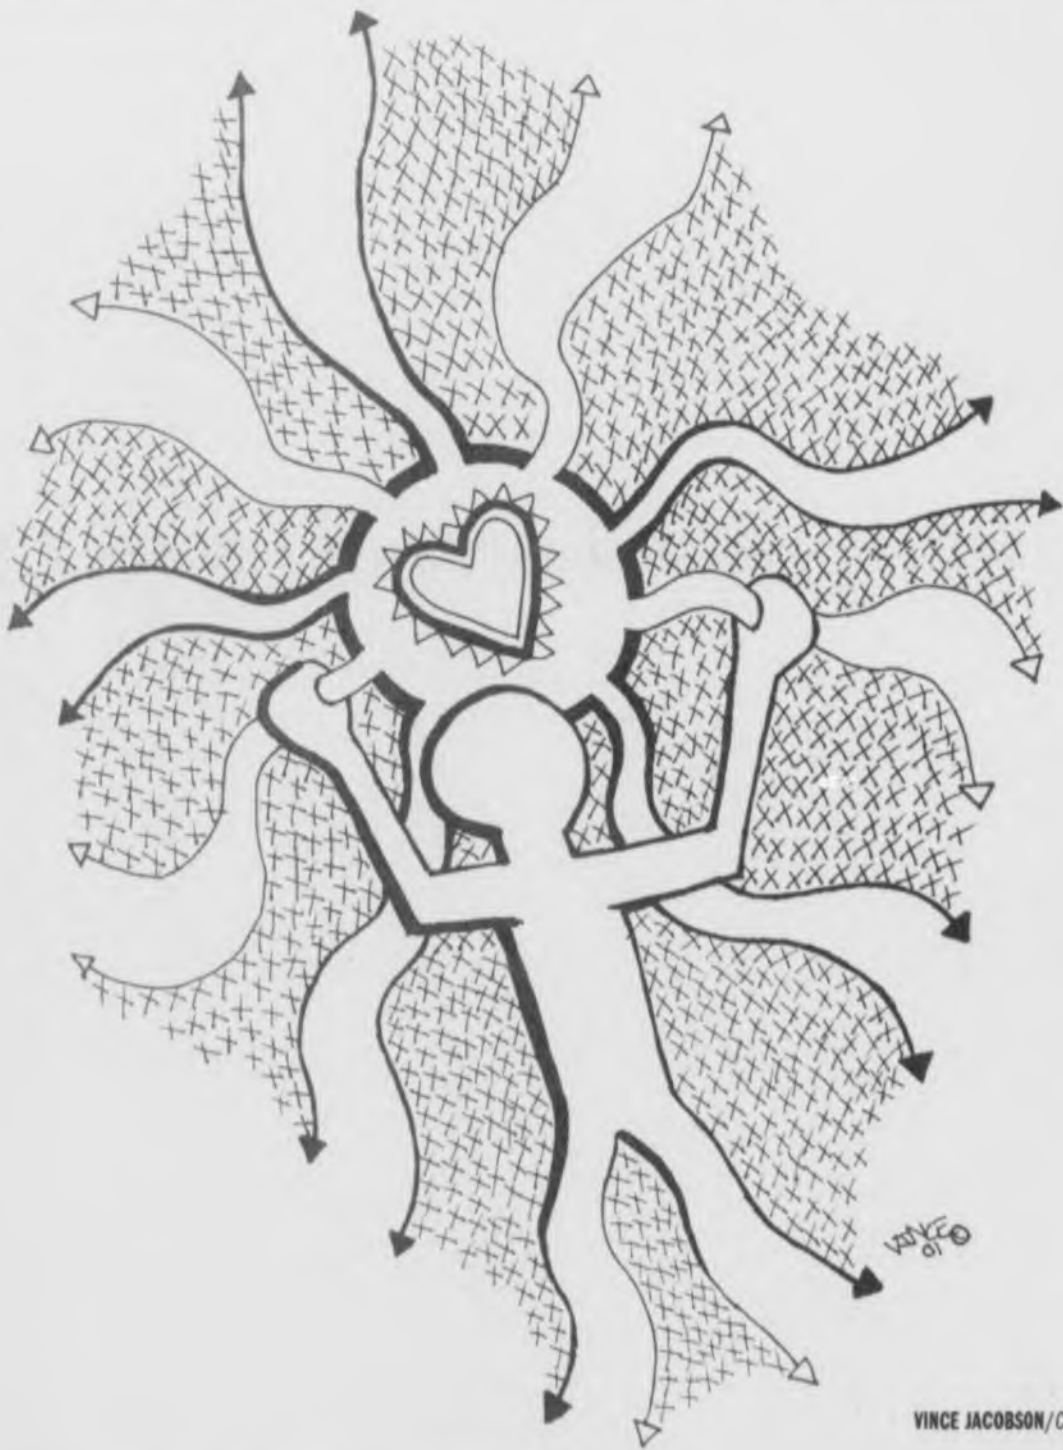

You know, I couldn't sleep last night, so this morning I watched the sun rise. And although it didn't fill the empty place in my heart, I seized every moment of it, every magnificent streak of pink and orange; and I thought about how maybe I had never seen a more beautiful sunrise.

But maybe before, I had never really seen a sunrise at all. Seize the day. We miss you, Sam.

President's appearance means everything

Bill Clinton has been the president for more than one third of my life. My needs were relatively simple during this period. I spent the first half of his administration struggling through puberty, and the second half standing in the drop/add line at enrollment services.

Because my life has had such a minimal impact on his, I can hardly feel responsible for the situation at hand; Bill Clinton looks like hell. While I try not to make a myth of physical beauty, I am nonetheless disturbed that the former leader of the free world went from Pepsodent pretty boy to Boris Yeltsin's liver in less than a decade.

Anyone catching retrospectives of the Clinton years on CNN or assorted TV news magazines would be startled by visions of the original bushy-tailed politico. All rugged grin and tussled salt-and-pepper hair, our boy Bill looked like the kind of sexy older man who might star opposite Catherine Zeta-Jones.

It's no secret that his camera-friendly aesthetic was a key element of his success. Then, in a stroke so classically tragic that Sophocles could have penned it, the same medium that allowed him so much fortune chewed him up and spit him out.

Martin Sheen, on the other hand, has never looked better. Although he'll soon be eligible for the senior's discount at Denny's, old man Sheen appears to be in his prime in NBC's "The West Wing." In the role of a fictional president, the ridiculously idealized Jed Bartlett, he is reminiscent of an early President Clinton (glint in eye, cleft in chin, spring in step).

For that matter, the popular prime time drama gives us a White House full of beautiful people who manage to maintain grace and appearances at all times. Even after a bloody assassination attempt, the President and his staff seemed relatively fresh-faced.

And what's wrong with pretty faces? Nothing, I suppose. But last fall the film "The Contender" featured an evil, conservative senator played by Gary Oldman.

CHRIS PIATT

Just to make sure we knew he was the bad guy, make-up artists distorted him so grotesquely that he looked like a schoolmaster from a Dickens novel.

The message seems to be that better looking politicians have stronger moral codes.

Unfortunately, as the march of time has left its heavy footprints on Clinton's face, this notion becomes reinforced. Young, suave, and steely, he was the right man for the job. Now ravaged and wobbly, he's merely a philandering husband and a small-time crook. The days of the cool sunglasses and swinging saxophone on the Arsenio Hall Show are now as difficult to remember as, well, Arsenio Hall.

The Clinton Administration now seems to be nothing more than a standard episode of "Behind the Music." An average musician becomes wildly popular, overestimates his own power and abilities, falls prey to a reckless sex life, and ends up bloated, strung-out, and doomed to have his life anthologized by "rock journalists."

We're now three days into the Bush administration, and our president seems to look just fine (glint in eye, cleft in chin, spring in step).

This is ultimately misleading, but the more weathered he becomes, the less enamored his constituents will be with his marital fidelity and ability to win graciously.

My hope is that as time passes, we able to be able to look at footage of Clinton in his final days and see that the truth was written all over his face. Our president's appearance was so unappealing because at the end of the twentieth century he looked like most people felt — mediocre.

Students, base lead to low voter turnout

By KAREN MAYSE
Kansas State Collegian

As the presidential inauguration caps one of the closest elections in history, local officials ponder reasons for the low voter turnout in Riley County.

Deputy County Clerk Jolene Campbell said 18,395 ballots were cast in the 2000 general election in Riley County, which represents just 57.9 percent of the registered voters in the county. That number includes certified provisional ballots and is well under the 67.3-percent state average of registered voters that voted in the general election.

According to the Kansas secretary of state, of the 105 Kansas counties, only Butler, Decatur, Seward and Geary had a lower voter turnout. Campbell said the university and Fort Riley affect the rate of voter turnout in Riley County. Two of the four precincts with the lowest voter turnout were areas heavily populated by K-State students, and one was an area near Fort Riley.

"Our voter registration rolls are pretty close to 20 percent inflated due to the fact that we are a transient community," Campbell said.

Campbell said that if students or military personnel move from the county, those people can't be removed from the registration rolls unless they personally notify the county clerk's office.

Officials can't accept the word of a student's parents, but will ask for the student's new address. Officials have to mail a reply card to the student and hope the student signs and returns the card — something Campbell said rarely happens.

The only other way a student may be dropped from Riley County rolls is if the student mentions they previously were registered to vote in Riley County when registering to vote in a different county in Kansas. Since all Kansas counties report to the secretary of state, that information eventually will be shared with Riley County.

Still, Riley County Democratic Party Chairwoman Martha Gray said officials should not be too hasty to remove names from the rolls. She said anyone who wishes to vote should be allowed and encouraged to vote.

"It is most important that we not purge our list of those who wish to vote," Gray said. "The problems that were encountered in Florida in the 2000 election are not mistakes we wish to repeat in Riley County."

Charles Hostetler, Riley County Republican Party chairman, said he thought another reason the voter turnout was so poor was there were very few local-contested races. He said local republicans offer rides to polling places and encourage advance voting.

"We're cognizant of trying to get the vote out, but it's difficult at best," said Hostetler.

Campbell said the county clerk's office intends to continue working on this problem during the next four years.

Officials might look to K-State for help in determining who might have moved from the community. Then they can try to get new addresses, forward the postage-paid reply cards and hope to hear back.

Flour mill closer to groundbreaking

By CHARLIE MORASCH
Kansas State Collegian

K-State is $1 million closer to breaking ground on its Grain Science Complex.

Archer Daniels Midland Company, a worldwide milling company, announced Dec. 8 that it was donating $1 million to K-State to go toward building a $5.2-million flour mill. The flour mill is one of five buildings that will comprise the Grain Science Complex. The flour mill will be used to train students through a four-year program.

Faculty in the Department of Grain and Science Industry said a donation of $1 million is a welcome rarity.

"As far as grain science goes, we get donations of equipment and things like that and donations to our scholarship fund," said Dale Eustace, professor of grain science and industry, "but that's the largest one that we've received in a long time."

Eustace said only a company the size of ADM Milling likely would make a donation like it did, and that the donation is an important start to K-State's fund-raising process.

"ADM is the No. 1 milling company in the world," Eustace said. "With this complex, ADM got the ball rolling by donating this $1 million."

Other buildings on the complex will be a feed mill, a bioprocessing and industrial value-added center, an international grains program conference center and a teaching, research and administrative building.

Eustace said the last time he remembers the Grain Science and Industry department receiving a donation of this size was during the 1950s.

"They may have had some money donated after they rebuilt the flour mill after it burned down in August of 1957," Eustace said. "I think the state rebuilt the building, and then the industry donated the equipment."

Donnelly said K-State has had a long relationship with ADM and that the donation was similar to an investment.

"It's critical because they hire a lot of our students who graduate from our program," Donnelly said. "ADM has hired a lot of our graduates over the years, and a lot of them are in management positions at ADM."

Eustace also said K-State's relationship with ADM played an important role in the donation.

"It's support of the program, so they can be sure of having graduates they can hire to work in their plant."

Eustace said not all funds will come from donations.

"In this case, the state is going to put up one of the five buildings, and we have to go out and raise the money for the rest of them," Eustace said.

Donnelly said K-State is closer to beginning construction because of ADM's donation.

"Yeah, we're closer. And we've got other activities going on, contacts with other milling industries. We'll just have to wait and see how they turn out," he said.

Donnelly said that although K-State is working hard to generate donations for the Grain Science Complex, ground will not be broken until the funds are accounted for.

"We can't break ground until all of the money is committed," Donnelly said. "The funds we've received from ADM is just part of the total cost, so until all those funds are in place, we can't break ground. We were hoping we could break ground this year, but if we don't get all of the money this year, then we go into next year."

Faltering finish

Last-minute mistakes hurt Cats in overtime OU loss

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

With just five seconds remaining in regulation, it was nearly impossible for Oklahoma to avoid losing to K-State's men's basketball team.

Trailing 53-55, Oklahoma forward Daryan Selvy already had missed the first of two free throws. The Sooners' last hope lay in the off-chance that someone would rebound and score an intentionally-bricked Selvy free throw.

"We knew he was going to miss," Cat forward Travis Reynolds said. "We should've gotten the rebound."

They should have, but they didn't.

Instead, Sooner guard Nolan Johnson grabbed the rebound and tied the game up.

Then, with 13.4 seconds left in the subsequent overtime, K-State led 63-62.

Following an intentional foul by Oklahoma forward Aaron McGhee, all the Cats had to do to win was make two free throws and then get the ball inbounds.

They didn't.

Sophomore forward Matt Siebrandt missed both free throws. Then, after a K-State timeout, sophomore forward Quentin Buchanan threw the inbounds pass to Oklahoma's Hollis Price, who made an uncontested lay-up.

Oklahoma now led 64-63. With 10 seconds left, K-State had a slim chance to win, but the game essentially was over.

"It's heartbreaking knowing there's no time on the clock. You don't have another chance to get a good shot," point guard Larry Reid said. "It was pretty much over right there."

All the Cats could do was watch the Sooners pile up at mid-court, knowing the result should have been different.

"We had an opportunity to win down the stretch, both in regulation and overtime. I feel bad for our guys, I really do," head coach Jim Wooldridge said. "I think our guys gave a valiant effort. I thought they played their hearts out. We just didn't do enough good things, both at the end of regulation and at the end of overtime, to finish the game."

The result was even more disappointing knowing that K-State had outplayed Oklahoma the entire game. The Sooners entered the contest averaging 80 points per game, and the Cat defense kept them to 55 through regulation.

"We fight like that, and then we literally give them a lay-up to earn the victory," Wooldridge said. "Gave them a lay-up — there was nobody in front of him. That's really disappointing. We've worked our tails off, and we hold Oklahoma to 33-percent field goal percentage, and yet the last play was unguarded because of a mistake."

"You'd like to have it back, but you can't get it back. For our team, it's a real shame. We can't get this game back."

Even 30 minutes after the game, the Cats already were pondering what could have been. For instance, K-State was just 6-14 from the free throw line in overtime.

Similarly,

Buchanan's turnover on the inbounds play that gave Oklahoma the win was the result of a series of miscues.

"We have a discrepancy between our staff and the officials. We were told that the ball was going to be inbounds on the baseline," Wooldridge said. "Not until our timeout was concluded did we find out the ball was going to be inbounds on the sideline. There's a discrepancy in that we believe that's what we were told."

"The only thing we could do at that point was get into stack and triple pick for Larry to get him towards the basketball and then spray out of that, and everybody's a receiver at that point, depending on how they play it."

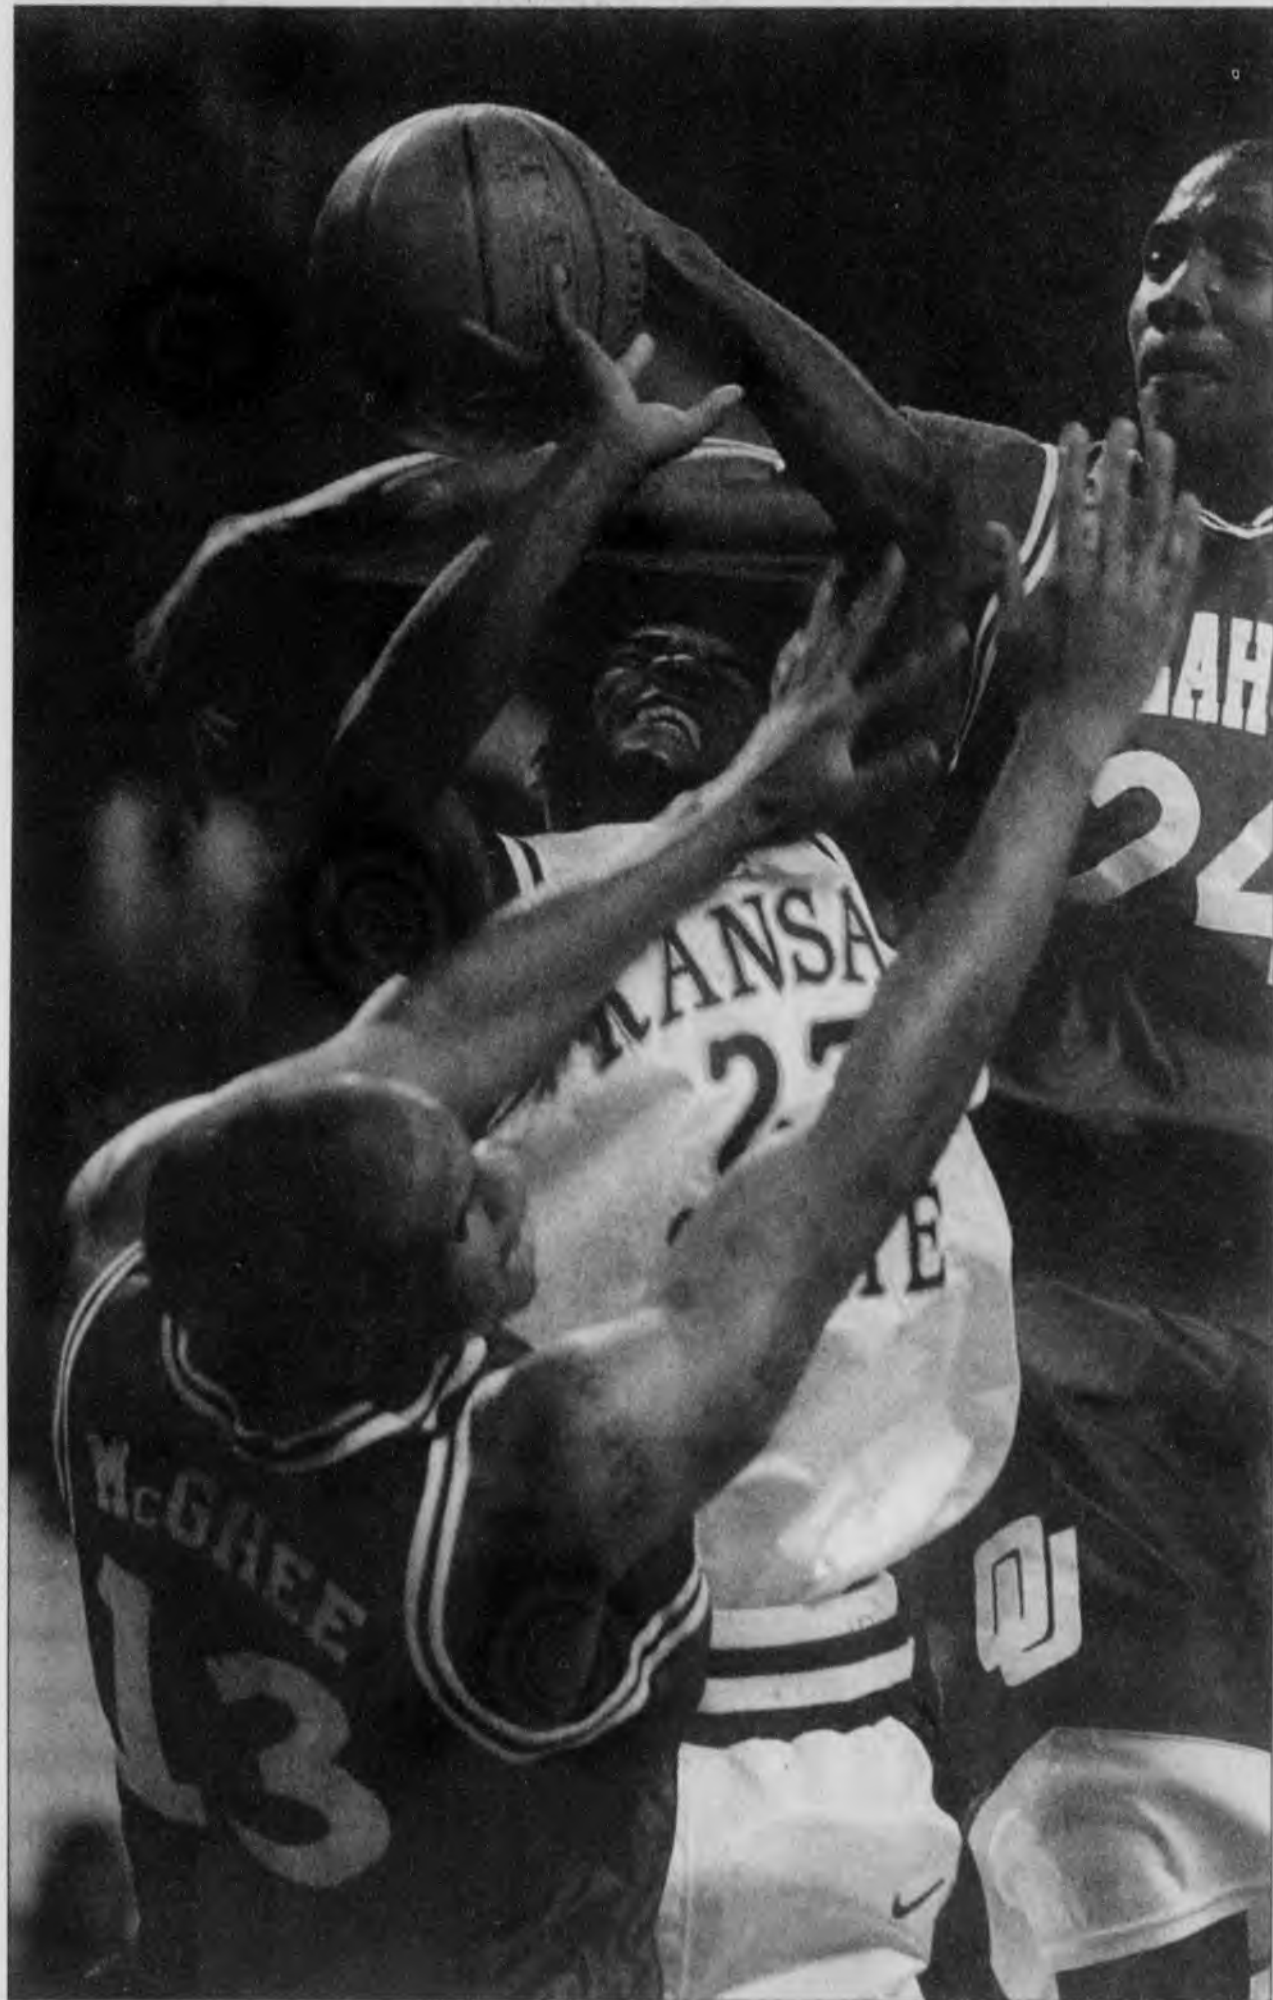

Still, though, the officials weren't to blame for the loss.

"All we've got to do is get it inbounds, somebody's going to foul," Wooldridge said.

Despite the result, however, K-State did bring many positives away from the game. The Cat defense, for the most part, frustrated a potent Oklahoma offense. Offensively, until overtime, K-State dominated Oklahoma inside, outscoring the Sooners 22-16 in the paint.

The effort by K-State was good enough to win, Wooldridge said.

"I really believed our guys gave a great effort for the entire game, which included the overtime," he said. "I just told the whole team, I said, 'Listen, you played hard enough to win. You played with great character and hard, and I know it hurts. I feel bad for you, but we've got to move on.'"

Free throws plague K-State down the stretch against OU

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

Oklahoma head coach Kelvin Sampson might have said it best.

"If Kansas State makes their free throws, they win it," he said. "It's that simple. They could've easily won that game."

It might have been that simple Saturday night, but K-State folded down the stretch to gift-wrap Oklahoma's 64-63 overtime victory and botch what could have been the Wildcats' third win over a ranked opponent this season.

K-State, after hitting on 17 of 20 free throw attempts in regulation, shot a paltry 6 of 14 from the line in the overtime period.

"We've got to make free throws down the stretch," head coach Jim Wooldridge said. "Everyone that played in that game was responsible for it. It's a tough deal to live with, it really is, but we've just got to show a little bit of character and move on."

Not the easiest task, though, considering Oklahoma only led K-State for 1:17 through 45 minutes of action, including just 32 seconds of the overtime frame.

Yet, even K-State players know free throws were the difference, said guard Larry Reid, who shot two for six in the extra period.

"Coming to the line, we should knock those down," he said. "Those are an easy two points. It seems like we just gave it to them, rather than they just came in here and took it from us."

In fact, K-State looked to be in command much of the OT. A Reid free throw with less than 20 seconds left gave K-State a 63-60 lead, but Oklahoma's Hollis Price cut the margin to one at the 0:13.4 mark.

Then, Cat forward Matt Siebrandt was fouled by Sooner Aaron McGhee before the ball was inbounds from the baseline, resulting in an intentional foul call and giving K-State the ball back after Siebrandt's two foul shots.

Sampson displayed his emotion as he dropped to his hands and knees in front of the OU bench, and Cat players started to feel the game was theirs, Reid said.

"I was feeling pumped," he said. "I just knew we were going to win — jumping up and down, fans rushing the floor, it's going to be great."

But it wasn't, as Siebrandt missed both free throw attempts and Quentin Buchanan's inbound pass was intercepted by Price, who took the ball the other way for a lay-up and a 64-63 OU lead with 10 seconds to play.

Travis Reynolds' last second shot attempt was stripped and stolen by Nolan Johnson, although the Cat forward said he might have been fouled on the play.

"When I went up, I felt like I got hit, but I guess the refs didn't see it," Reynolds said.

Nevertheless, there were only two officials to make that final call, as referee Tom Harrington suffered a severely sprained ankle at the 19:32 mark of the second half and did not return.

Yet, Wooldridge said he isn't certain whether Cats lose to Big 12 rival Mizzou, 60-65

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

COLUMBIA, Mo. — K-State learned a hard lesson Saturday at the hands of conference foe Missouri.

"If you're not tough on the road, you're going to go home with a loss," head coach Deb Patterson said after the Cats (11-6, 1-5) fell to the Tigers (12-5, 3-3) 65-60 in Columbia. "They were tougher, more mature competitors today than we were."

Patterson's squad seemed to pick up where it left off after Wednesday night's win against then-No. 17 Texas early against the Tigers.

A Kim Woodlee three-pointer, one of six on the afternoon, gave the Cats an early lead just 16 seconds into the game to set the pace for the first half. After another early Woodlee three-pointer fell three minutes into the game, K-State led by eight, and it looked like it might be a long day for the Tigers.

Then, like it would so many times on the day, MU went on a run.

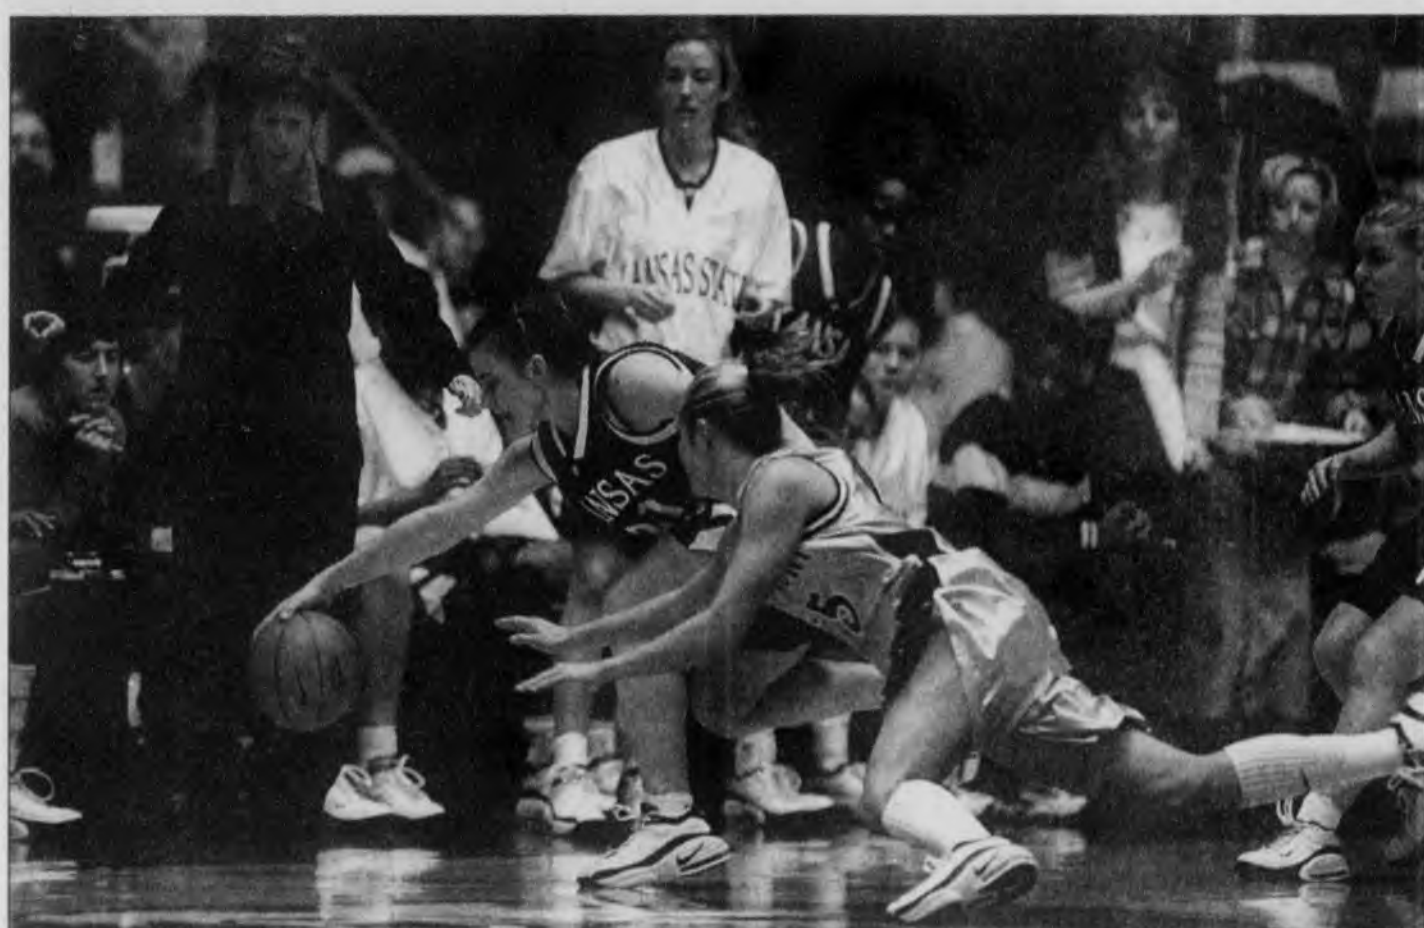

Sparked by two Wildcat turnovers and Wanette Smith's jump shot with 11:42 to go, Missouri cut the K-State lead to two at the 8:31 mark in the first half. Woodlee's next three-pointer gave the Cats another big lead and another chance to pull away, but a K-State defense plagued with what Patterson described as individual mistakes allowed consecutive treys by Tiger star Amanda Lassiter. Once again, the lead was dashed.

On two of the Cats' final first-half possessions, freshman Nicole Ohlde grabbed three offensive rebounds, but K-State was unable to score on either possession and settled for a four point lead going into halftime.

Although K-State was able to keep the Tigers to just 38-percent shooting in the first half, MU was able to hit the big shot when necessary and kept the game close by forcing nine first-half turnovers.

The second half saw each team's shooting fortune reversed, a statistic that would favor Missouri the rest of the game. Coming off a hot-shooting 45-percent first half, K-State made just 10 shots in the second half and ended the game at 39 percent from the field.

Whereas the Cats struggled to K-State guard Kim Woodlee and Missouri guard Kerensa Barr go after a loose ball during the first half of the game Saturday at Hearnes Center in Columbia, Mo. Woodlee had 18 points in the 65-60 loss to Missouri.

establish shooting consistency, the Tigers seemed to find their stroke, hitting 47 percent of 30 shots in the second half, including guard Kerensa Barr's nine points on four-of-six attempts in the final 20 minutes.

"We had to find a way to win, so we picked it up a little," Barr said. "We kind of felt a sense of urgency when we were down four."

K-State's lead would grow to six on an early Ohlde basket but then would shrink to one point four times in the next three minutes. Still, the Cats built another cushion when Woodlee's fifth three of the day fell with 10:05 to play to put K-State up seven.

Woodlee's final three gave K-State another eight-point lead with 8:21 to go, but the Tigers would put together a 12-2 run to take a 56-54 lead.

Marlena Williams' four rebounds and four points during that stretch ensured that Missouri would never trail again.

"The difference was there was a player on their team during that stretch when the game was on the line that stepped up and said, 'I'm going to win this ball game,'" Patterson said. "She stepped up big, and we were passive defensively."

Woodlee, who led the Cats with 18 points on the day, said the Cats need to regroup after suffering their fifth loss in six conference tries.

"We take away that 20 minutes of good basketball is not enough to win a game," Woodlee said, "and that starting the second half sloppy will lose you a basketball game."

Woodlee said the game came down to something even simpler than that.

"They just came out and outworked us," she said.

Missouri's hard work paid off in a comeback win that broke a two-game conference losing skid on MU head coach Cindy Stein's 40th birthday.

Senior guard moves into 30th place for 3-pointers

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

K-State senior guard Kim Woodlee reached another milestone Saturday in Columbia.

After draining six three-pointers against the Tigers, one short of her career mark, Woodlee moved ahead of Niagara's Kim Kuhn and Harvard's Erin Maher into 30th place in the NCAA for three-point baskets with 263.

Although Woodlee's 18 points against MU didn't result in a win for the Cats, the senior's individual performance was a memorable one. The 5-foot-8 guard from Beersheba Springs, Tenn., became only the fourth player from the Big 12 or Big 8 to be ranked in the top 30.

Coming into Saturday's game against Mizzou, Woodlee was ranked eighth in the country in three-point field goals per contest with 3.1 and 19th in the nation in percentage at 45.5 percent.

Woodlee surpassed K-State guard Steve Henson's record for three-pointers Dec. 17 against Vermont when she hit her 241st career three against the Catamounts.

K-State, Olympians compete in meet 2 great quarterbacks to play in Super Bowl

By ERIKA SAUERWEIN
Kansas State Collegian

Those attending the Wildcat Invitational Indoor track meet Friday and Saturday at Ahearn Field House witnessed not only two landslide victories by the K-State track team, but also had the unique opportunity to watch Olympians compete.

Along with the regularly scheduled meet, K-State played host to an open division in several events for post-collegiate athletes.

Nathan Leeper, Karol Damon and Sheila Burrell, all Olympians, participated in the meet.

Leeper, a former K-State student-athlete, jumped 7 feet, 7 3/4 inches in the high jump to set a personal best and an Ahearn Field House record. Leeper placed 11th in the long jump in the 2000 Summer Olympics.

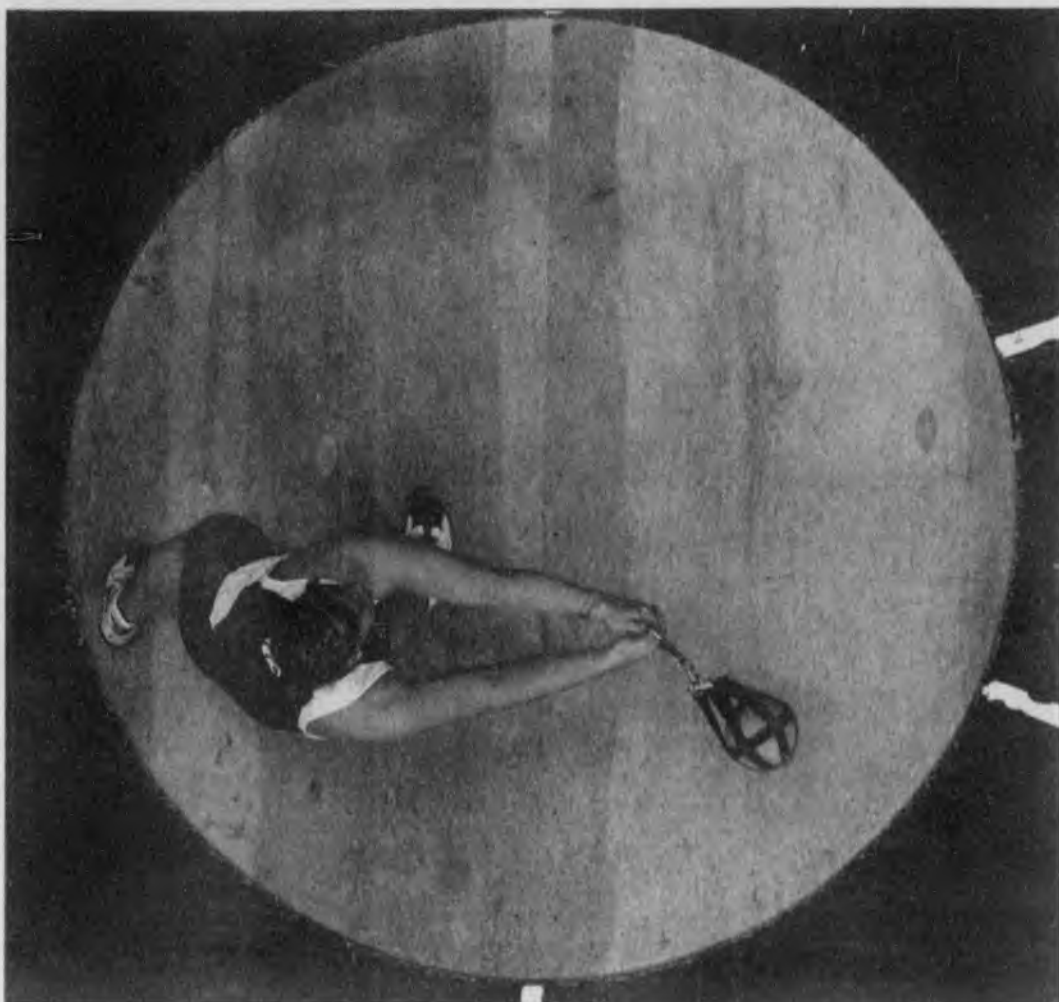

"I think two Americans have jumped higher in history," head coach Cliff Rovelto said. "It was phenomenal. If he was in Germany or Hungary or Great Britain they would have offered him a significant amount of money for him just to show up. You have people in Manhattan, Kansas, who had a chance to see it, and it didn't cost them anything. It's arguably the best single performance of an athlete ever on our facilities."

Leeper wasn't the only athlete to set an Ahearn record Saturday. Sophomore Amy Mortimer's time of 2:49.06 in the 1000 meters set a facility and meet record. Her win in the event was only one of 13 victories posted by the women's team. K-State finished the five-team meet with 196 points. Southwest Texas State tallied 129 points to place second.

On the men's side, the Wildcats won the meet by a margin of 97.5 points.

"That's not really what's important," Rovelto said. "We are looking more to see everybody's competing hard. That's what it's all about. Some of them are where they should be in training, some of them are real tired. But if you go out and compete hard, that's what is important, and we are seeing that."

The No. 5-ranked women's team won all but three events in the meet. Korene Hinds set a meet record with her time of 2:09.89 in the 800 meters. She broke Paulette Staats' 1992 record by more than four seconds. Teena Clincy also set K-State's Rebekah Green throws the weight throw Saturday at Ahearn Field House. Green finished second with a throw of 16.04 meters.

KELLY GLASSCOCK/Collegian

a meet record by winning the 60 meter hurdles in 8.8 seconds.

"On the track, we had a lot of solid performances," Rovelto said. "Ragean Hill ran a lot better this meet than she had last week. Korene Hinds and Nicole Grose ran well in the 800. And, of course, Amy Mortimer was outstanding."

In field events, freshman Queeneth Evurunobi continued to dominate the triple and long jump events.

She placed first in both events by jumping 39 feet, 5 1/2 inches in the triple jump and 18 feet, 8 inches in the long jump. She has won both events in the past three meets. Rebekah Green won the shot put event with a mark of 54 feet. Leslie Mikos tallied a personal best when she won the weight throw with a mark of 53 feet, 5 inches.

Terresha DeRossett won the high jump competition with a NCAA provisional mark of 5 feet, 9 3/4 inches.

She also tallied 3,538 points Friday to win the Wildcat Pentathlon.

"I felt pretty good for the first (pentathlon) meet of the year," DeRossett said. "There is still a lot of technique stuff I am still trying to work on. Those overall scoring marks weren't exactly my best. As for high jump, I want to jump higher to get to the NCAA tournament, which I think I am capable of. I think right now, ability wise, I am definitely there."

The men won six events to finish first with 182.5 points. Freshman Dustin McDonald won two events in the 60 meter and 200 meter titles. Shadrack Kimeli set a meet record in his 1,000 meters win with a time of 2:26.34. Tamal Sisney won the shot put with a mark of 56 feet, 4 3/4 inches. He also easily captured the weight throw title by throwing a mark almost 10 feet past second place finisher and teammate Adam White.

"In terms of quality marks, I thought Shadrack did a really nice job in the 1,000," Rovelto said. "That's a quality 1,000 for this time of year. And he also ran one leg in the (4x400 meter) relay. Tamal had a nice meet. His throw in shot put wasn't too far off his indoor personal record. There were a number of quality marks and good things today."

In the men's heptathlon, Justin Robinson placed third overall with a total of 5,092 points.

The track team travels to Missouri next weekend for the KSU-KU-MU Triangular. Unlike the last two meets where the men and women's competitions were treated separately, this weekend the teams will have a combined total. It's also the Wildcats' first time on the road, a challenge that will help focus the team, Rovelto said.

"We are at a point where volumes are starting to come down, but intensities are increasing. The cumulative effect is people are not real fresh by any means, and some people are banged up here and there," he said. "By the competition being on the road, we will be a little more focused. There will probably be more adrenaline. They will focus because they have to."

It's amazing how much a person's life can change in a year.

Two people who have seen drastic changes in their lives in the past 365 days are the starting quarterbacks in Sunday's Super Bowl. The Baltimore Ravens' Trent Dilfer and the New York Giants' Kerry Collins have turned their careers around since the end of last season and now find themselves in the Super Bowl.

Dilfer, the highest player ever drafted from Fresno State University, began last season as the starting quarterback for the Tampa Bay Buccaneers. Midway through the season he lost his starting job to Shaun King after getting hurt and putting up Ryan Leaf-type numbers. King then guided the Bucs to the NFC Championship game, and Dilfer was out of the job. He got picked up by the Ravens as a backup for Tony Banks.

Eight games into this season Dilfer replaced Banks as the Ravens' No. 1 quarterback. Since then, the Ravens are 10-1 and on a roll. He still isn't putting up big numbers, but he has done what's been asked of him.

The best part of Dilfer's story is that the Super Bowl is being played in Tampa. He returns to the city, where he spent the first six years of his pro career. This must be a bitter pill for the Bucs to swallow since they released Dilfer because they thought he could never take a team to the Super Bowl.

Collins' story is somewhat different. In his rookie year the former Penn State University star was brilliant, leading the Carolina Panthers to the NFC Championship game and making the Pro Bowl. Since then, his play has declined every year. He had a falling out with the Panthers' management and was let go. He was labeled as a quitter because of the way he played his last year in Carolina. After a brief and unsuccessful stint with New Orleans, he was signed by New York.

my view

Now, in his first season with the Giants, Collins has regained his old form. He has led them on a late-season surge that has seen them win the NFC East. He is hot coming off a massive NFC title game where the Giants destroyed Randy Moss and the Minnesota Vikings 41-0.

However, both of these quarterbacks have their work cut out for them. The Giants' defense is playing great after blanking the Vikings. The Ravens defense has been the best in the NFL this year, setting the record for points allowed. Each of these defenses is led by former University of Miami stars, the Giants' Jesse Armstead and the Ravens' NFL Defensive Player of the Year Ray Lewis.

I think these two teams' tough brand of defense will keep this game low scoring with few big plays.

I'm excited to watch the game because these two teams are evenly matched. In past years we have sat through Super Bowl blowouts.

I like the Ravens, 17-13. This will complete Dilfer's Cinderella story in the city and stadium he used to call home.

that had any effect on the game.

"It's hard to say. They did a commendable job with two officials," he said, "but it's hard to say how much of a difference, if any, it would have made."

At any rate, though, Reynolds said he couldn't help but feel that K-State should've won the ball game.

"I felt like we deserved to win," he said Saturday. "I think tonight the better team didn't win. I give credit to those Oklahoma guys. I've got respect for those guys, but I think we're a better team than them."

And knowing that just makes it even harder on the players to deal with, Wooldridge said.

"There's probably some guys on the team that we'll need help from to help mend this feeling we have tonight and find our way to the next game with a good healthy attitude, and try to improve our team as we move from the next day to the next day," he said.

"These aren't easy to take. I've been in some of them, both wins and losses, and they're difficult to live with."

The Cryptquip is a substitution cipher in which one letter stands for another. If you think that X equals O, it will equal O throughout the puzzle. Single letters, short words and words using an apostrophe give you clues to locating vowels. Solution is by trial and error.

film SNATCHES imagination

Pitt stars in anticipated follow-up, captive comic book-style movie

Gangsters, gypsies, jewel thieves, illegal boxing matches and flesh-eating pigs all figure into the tangled competition to find one big diamond in "Snatch."

Guy Ritchie's much anticipated follow-up to "Lock, Stock and Two Smoking Barrels" launches him from the realm of cultish foreign films straight into the mainstream to solidify his presence as a legitimate writer and director. "Snatch" is sure to hold audiences captive with Ritchie's special gift for creating interesting characters and weaving an unpredictable plot that doesn't leave any loose ends.

When an 84-karat diamond is stolen in Belgium and transported through London, word gets out, and a chain reaction sets off a race to get the stone. Seemingly every crime circle in London gets wrapped up in the story, and the characters are more than enough to keep the story spicy.

Turkish Jason Statham, "Lock, Stock and Two Smoking Barrels" is a fight promoter in the shady world of bare-knuckle boxing who can't ever seem to get a break. When he ends up indebted to a gangster named Brick Top (Alan Ford, "Lock, Stock and Two Smoking Barrels") he has to rely on an unpredictable gypsy boxer (Brad Pitt, "Fight Club") to throw a fight.

The story gets more interesting as the characters become mixed up with each other to create a story filled with dark humor and witty dialogue.

Ritchie has proven that "Two Smoking Barrels" was no fluke, although his originality will always be in question by fans of "Pulp Fiction."

Each character gets adequate screen time to create a real person, from a maniacal Russian black-market gun salesman, a polite hit man with bullets for manacles, Pitt's performance as Mickey steals the show when he is on screen with his incoherent speech, tattooed body and knockout punch.

While the movie has its share of stars, it is the no-name actors that Ritchie made famous in this and "Two Smoking Barrels" that make "Snatch" come together. The ensemble cast brings the script to life to make a believable story.

With its almost comic-book style with no real linear time and larger-than-life characters, "Snatch" is one of the most fun movies to watch in the last year.

MOVIE REVIEW BY JJ DUNCAN

Movie, entertainment for mystery movie goers

Annie Wilson has the weight of a small town on her shoulders.

In "The Gift," Cate Blanchett (who played the title role in 1998's "Elizabeth") portrays Annie, a woman who does tarot card readings for a living. Each day, she is burdened with seeing the problems of others, from a battered wife (Hilary Swank, "Boys Don't Cry") to a manic depressive mechanic with abandonment issues (Giovanni Ribisi, "Gone in 60 Seconds"). And, of course, there are her own struggles to deal with: she is a widowed mother raising three children, all the while dodging the threats of an angry redneck (Keanu Reeves, "The Replacements"), who labels her as a witch. To her clients, Annie has a special gift. Soon, however, that gift is put to the test when the daughter (Katie Holmes, "Disturbing Behavior") of a prominent businessman is murdered, and everyone in town becomes a suspect ... even Annie's love interest (Greg Kinnear, "Nurse Betty").

Directed by Sam Raimi and written by Tom Epperson and Billy Boh Thornton ("Sling Blade"), the all-star cast does a fantastic job of fitting into the roles of simple folk in Small Town, USA. Although the movie would've fared even better with more background information on the main characters, Blanchett and company work very well with what they've been given and adapt well to these roles. Blanchett adopts a slight Southern drawl with ease, a far cry from her own Australian accent. Although Blanchett is the shining star in this film, Swank and Ribisi manage to steal some of the spotlight as well in their roles as troubled townsfolk haunted by the proverbial ghosts of their past and present.

Perhaps, though, Thornton and Epperson took on a bit too much with their numerous subplots. The mini-stories that intertwine with the murder, while exciting and dramatic, add an element of confusion. Still, if you can keep up with the many people who cross paths with Annie Wilson, you should be fine.

Chock full of thrills and controversy, "The Gift" will delight those who love a good murder mystery.

Monkey Boy

BY BRENT ENGSTROM — MONKEYBOYCOMIC@HOTMAIL.COM

Josh Zink, junior in anthropology, walks through a tunnel between Van Zile and Boyd halls Friday night. Zink makes nightly rounds of the boiler rooms to ensure that everything is operating properly.

AFTER DARK

"Going in is like calling in the 'Wolf,'" Zink said. "Yeah, you got a problem, we will fix it."

Dave Larson, resident assistant in Marlatt Hall and senior in biology, said the student service technicians are underappreciated.

"There is not enough appreciation for what they do," Larson said. "Not a lot of people see what they have to do, and it can be nasty."

Zink said it is a humble job.

"We are appreciated in a maintenance type of way," Zink said. "Maintenance is such a dirty task. It is almost a second-rate task."

Zink has cultivated a friendship with a janitor in Waters Hall. He said he talks to him because most people don't. Zink knows what that is like.

"Janitors perform a task that is extremely thankless," Zink said.

"The janitor in Waters Hall does an excellent job, but I imagine most people have no idea who he is. This is just one of those jobs."

Another room had extensive smoke damage and minimal degrees of smoke damage exist throughout the remaining rooms in the house.

Myers had no comment on additional information.

The fraternity was last inspected in September 2000, and due to privacy issues, Francis said sleeping areas normally are not checked unless invited in by the occupant. Most wiring problems in the house were found in sleeping areas.

"After the fire, I completed a fire inspection the next day of each room and checked the wiring,"

Francis said. "I went in and found wiring problems in almost every room."

A written letter to the Pike Housing Corporation is being worked on, Francis said. It will give them 14 days to respond in writing on how they plan to correct the problem and what action will be taken.

Francis said they have 30 days to remove the wiring that is in violation and must give a timetable of when things will be corrected.

"After talking with the occupants, it appears a lot of wiring was done in the last year or maybe past couple of years," Francis said.

Francis also said this is a very common problem.

Ryan Schaffer, junior in biology and Pike member, returned to the house Thursday night.

Schaffer said an out-of-house member was able to provide him with a place to stay the night of the fire.

Schaffer said his room was on the bottom level adjacent to where the fire broke out. He had no personal damage.

"There was no electronic damage, but my clothes do smell like smoke," Schaffer said.

For the occupants of the room that was totally destroyed, a collection was taken to buy them clothing since all of it was lost, Schaffer said.

"It's real unfortunate for those guys who lost everything," he said.

ENROLLMENT

Across campus, more than 21,000 students enrolled last semester, and it is a process that requires planning, patience and a little bit of luck. While filling out schedules, students worked with advisers and attempted to get into the courses they needed.

Arlo Bieri, professor of agricultural economics, said early planning is key to making enrollment run smoothly.

"Probably the No. 1 problem is juniors and seniors who do not come in to get advised on time, and don't go through the pre-enrollment process," he said. "If they don't go through pre-enrollment, then it is an extremely difficult process."

Still, there are students like English who are unable to get into the course they needed.

Accounting for Business Operations is a course that can be difficult to get into. Stanley Elsea, associate dean in the College of Business Administration, said those lower-level accounting courses tend to fill up because they are required by sequences throughout the university. In addition to being a required course for several majors outside the business college, Elsea said the college has seen its enrollment increase.

"We have seen a steady increase in the last five years in the graduate and undergraduate program," Elsea said.

Increased enrollment, Elsea said, can pose a challenge with regards to the number of classes offered.

Various factors including accreditation standards, hiring quality faculty and the lack of graduate teaching assistants make it difficult to simply add courses.

"There is not a high pool of people out there who are looking to teach," he said. "The people we are wanting to hire in some areas could make more out in the business world. So the people we get have to want to teach."

Elsea said cost-effective measures can take place like hiring multiple instructors for the cost of one professor, but Elsea said sometimes there just are not enough classes.

"In the best of all worlds we always have a few empty seats at the end of enrollment," he said. "But I don't care whether it is economics or anything else, it is a fact of life that sometimes we can never have enough supply."

Elsea said the school has received strong support from the university's administration, which associate vice president of institutional advancement Pat Bosco said works to monitor the enrollment process throughout the university.

"We monitor enrollment specific to seminar classes projection of freshman and transfer students which factor into our new student enrollment," Bosco said. "We then make recommendations to a dean or department on whether to decrease or increase a section."

One area in the College of Arts and Sciences where enrollment seems to be improving is the Department of English, Bosco said. Larry Rodgers, head of the department of English, said the system was put into place a couple of years ago to help accommodate students' needs.

"We try to take a student-friendly approach," Rodgers said. "We give top priority to graduating seniors."

However, Rodgers said it is a different set situation than other colleges and departments on campus due to budgets and the cost of faculty. Rodgers said that in the Department of English if a new English course is added, he can meet the need by hiring a graduate teaching assistant, something the College of Business doesn't have the luxury of doing.

"We are dealing with a very different set of issues than someone in the College of Business Administration," Rodgers said.

Regardless of the major, officials said graduating seniors would receive priority.

"We have never had a student who needed a class have his graduation delayed. If a senior needs a class to graduate, then the department works to get them in," Elsea said.

Students said that as they accumulate more hours, the classes they need are easier to get into.

Kevin Tappy, junior in business administration, said now that he has gained more credit hours, classes are easier to get into.

"I didn't have enough hours to get into the classes I needed a few years ago," he said. "I just tried to get most of the electives out of the way. I am liking school more now because classes are more in my major."

student participation.

Roger Steinbrock, K-State-Salina's public and alumni relations coordinator, said the funds received will be utilized for student project development.

"You are only helping yourself as a member of the college family," he said.

Every night, 25 student volunteers will participate in Salina. Alumni will be asked to provide financial support for the development of future students' education. Gifts may be given by cash, credit or a pledge to the organization.

In joint efforts, K-State Manhattan and Salina have made the Telefund the world's largest all-volunteer higher education campaign.

Gordon Dowell, director of annual giving and Telefund, said he credits the success of the annual event to many things, including alumni participation, student enthusiasm, business support and campus networking.

Shootings still under investigation

By CRISTINA JANNEY
Kansas State Collegian

Police had no suspects Monday in the Sunday shooting that injured a K-State student and killed a Fort Riley soldier.

The greek organizations that were having a party nearby said the incident had nothing to do with them. Phi Beta Sigma and Zeta Phi Beta were co-sponsoring a party at the Fraternal Order of the Eagles Club, 312 S. Fourth St., Saturday night.

"The fact is that it had nothing to do with the party," said Euston Davis, former president of Phi Beta Sigma.

Isabel Amaya, sophomore in microbiology, was shot in the left arm as she stood outside of the club at about 2 a.m. Sunday.

She was taken to Mercy Health Center on College Avenue, but the hospital still was not releasing information on her condition Monday.

"She was just like any other K-State student attending an event," Davis said.

Shaun S. Leach, 4-1 Field Artillery, Fort Riley, died from a gunshot wound to his torso, according to an autopsy that was conducted Sunday.

He was the passenger in a 1995 Honda driven by James Hawthorne, also of the 4-1 Field Artillery. Hawthorne suffered a gunshot wound to his leg.

Capt. Gary Grubbs of the Riley County Police Department said the matter still was under investigation, and officers were not making any assumptions about where the shots came from or at whom they might have been targeted.

Fort Riley's Criminal Investigation Division also is investigating the shooting but was not releasing any information Monday.

Euston would not comment on why the groups had chosen to have an off-campus party or if they would choose that option in the future.

Jewel Harris, multicultural programs and services, said she had no comment on the shooting or university policy relating to off-campus parties.

Flu shots available at Lafene

By ALYSON RALETZ
Kansas State Collegian

Flu vaccinations now are available at Lafene Health Center after a three-month delay.

"Each year the flu vaccine has to be reformulated because the flu virus changes every year," Jay Reppert, medical director of Lafene, said.

There has been a nationwide delay of flu vaccines to the general public, Reppert said. Lafene has had its vaccine ordered since last March, he said.

Last academic year, Lafene administered 1,500 vaccines, but this year only 500 students or staff members have received the shot, he said.

"The decrease is because we simply did not have the vaccine until now," he said.

Carol Kennedy, director of health education and promotion services, said some students might have received the shots elsewhere.

"It's a possibility that students got the shots while they were home during break," Kennedy said.

Nobody likes shots, Reppert said. Most students get the flu and get over it pretty quickly, he said.

"A nurse told me it just takes one case of getting the flu badly, and you'll be more apt to get the shot the next flu season," she said.

Angel Hecht, junior in early childhood development, said she received the shot for a different reason.

"I am working at a preschool and I am around a lot of little kids," Hecht said. "She said I was pretty likely to get sick if I didn't get the shot."

Reppert said the shot prevents getting sick and missing school. Mainly, it is for people with chronic diseases who may have a difficult time with the infection, he said.

"The vaccine is 90-percent effective against preventing the flu," he said. "I am talking about influenza with symptoms such as fever, body aches, chills, headache, coughs and sore throat. The shot does not prevent severe flu when vomiting is involved," he said.

Kennedy said the shot takes two weeks to be effective.

She said the last time shots will be available this semester would be from 8:30 to 11:30 a.m. and 1:30 to 4:40 p.m. Thursday at Lafene.

"If students knew the shots were only $7, they would come in," Hecht said. "It's really cheap when you think about it. I think the problem is no one knows the vaccines are here yet. Unless you walk into Lafene and see the big yellow sign, you really wouldn't know about it."

FLU SHOTS

Where: Lafene Health Center
When: 8:30 a.m. to 11:30 a.m. and 1:30 p.m. to 4:40 p.m. today through Thursday.
Cost: $7 for students and $10 for faculty and staff.
Note: There is a 20-minute waiting period after shot, so allow at least 45 minutes for the visit.

Tony Neff, fifth-year senior in architecture, jokes with fellow classmates as he works on a site model of Kansas City. Neff is one of the many students who work late hours in Seaton Hall as part of their architecture studies.

Architecture student spends countless hours away from home

By COLLEEN FOOTE
Kansas State Collegian

He has not had a good meal in days. It has been a long time since he has slept through the night. He has not seen his apartment in awhile. He cannot find time to work out.

His home is Seaton Hall, and his name is Tony Neff.

Neff, a fifth-year architecture student, spends the majority of his time where he has spent most of his college years at K-State — in the studio rooms of Seaton Hall.

"This is my home away from home," said Neff, who sometimes spends an entire day in studio. "Some people like to work during the day hours, but I like to get my stuff done during the night because I'm more productive then."

CAMPUS after dark

Editor's note: This story is the second of a Collegian series featuring articles about the people who work and study on campus at night.

Neff said architecture students sacrifice more of their college lives compared to other students. It sometimes is frustrating not to have as much free time as other students have, he said.

"I don't really have much of a social life because my social life is in here," Neff said. "If I don't put in the time, my grades will suffer."

Utility, technology funding shortage concerns of K-State

By AMY MORGAN
Kansas State Collegian

The Kansas Board of Regents is concerned with a funding shortage after Gov. Bill Graves' proposed budget was announced.

The $14-million budget proposed by Graves has created a total shortage of $4.5 million in funding for K-State unless the shortage can be compensated for.

John Struve, director of the budget office, said the governor uses a method called the current service total to calculate how much the university will need based on a budget report that K-State provides to the regents each year.

"The current services total process has been in place for many years, but usually the governor budgets what the university requests," Struve said.

This year, Graves went with the current service total instead, which created a $2 million shortage for K-State. K-State also is looking at $1.5 million of funding shortages in utility costs.

"To compensate for the utility funding shortage, K-State will have to University tries to keep heating bills down

By NICK BRATKOVIC
Kansas State Collegian

Temperatures in classrooms across K-State's campus have been set at 68 degrees this winter to curb the cost of increasing gas prices.

K-State had a gas contract for the current year, said Ed Rice, associate vice president and director of the Division of Facilities. However, when the supplier Mountain Energy filed for bankruptcy, the contract was canceled, and K-State entered into a contract with a new company.

Under the new contract with Oak One, Rice said, K-State is paying $4.75 per MCF or unit of gas — instead of the $2.59 per MCF originally negotiated price with Mountain Energy.

The increased figure, along with other costs, puts K-State over its budget by approximately $730,000 through the month of November. As a result, students and teachers have been adjusting to the more strictly enforced temperature standards, Rice said.

"We haven't heard a lot of comments from the students," he said. "Some of the teachers on the faculty have expressed concern in the older buildings. We have an energy management shop that goes out and works to get the temperature in the room at 68 degrees."

K-State students said they experienced cooler classrooms in the morning than in the afternoon.

"My classes have been more cold than warm," Rayann Ezell, freshman in elementary education, said. "I have 7:30s every day this semester, so those morning classes can be a little bit colder."

Part of the reason morning classes are colder might be because temperatures in classrooms are lowered overnight and on weekends to temperatures ranging between 60 and 65 degrees.

Other K-State students said they had not experienced much discomfort in classes. Wynn Conover, sophomore in business, said classrooms for her have been about average.

"I really haven't experienced any problems," she said. "Everything has gone fine."

The 68-degree temperature has effectively kept the costs lower, Rice said.

Rice said the university measures temperature gaps by measuring heating

News of the Weird

Michael H. Cautela, 39, was sentenced to 200 hours community service in Columbus, Ohio, in December, specifically targeted to cleaning restrooms and zoo cages, for two counts of assaulting women by spraying them with a mixture of salad oil and urine. (When the judge asked why, Cautela said, "I just like to see ladies with oil on them." But, said the judge, "This had urine in it.") Cautela held firm: "It was mostly oil." And in December in Orlando, Fla., Joseph Edward Nichols, 29, was sentenced to five years in jail after a no-contest plea to squirting as many as 11 people with a water pistol containing his semen.

Opponents of abortion march on Statehouse

TOPEKA — Abortion opponents walked the halls of the Statehouse on Monday, urging an end to abortion.

The events, which were to include a rally, were timed with the 28th anniversary of the U.S. Supreme Court's Roe v. Wade ruling, which legalized abortion throughout the nation. Organizers from the group Kansans for Life handed out information about pro-life efforts, including literature about the stages of life and abortion procedures.

Children circulated, handing out red roses to each of the 165 state legislators.

On Friday, a group of legislators spoke to abortion-rights advocates in a meeting sponsored by the Kansas Choice Alliance as part of its Women's Health Day.

Senate Majority Leader Lana Olsen, R-Manhattan, said she expects bills to be filed this session to rewrite a state law designed to restrict late-term abortions. Pro-life activists argue the law contains loopholes and doesn't limit abortion.

Judge declares mistrial in Ohio tobacco case

WHEELING, W.Va. — A judge declared a mistrial Monday in a class-action case seeking to force tobacco companies to pay for regular medical tests on healthy smokers.

After previously ruling that addiction to cigarettes could not be a part of the trial, Ohio County Circuit Judge Arthur Recht had halted proceedings Thursday when a plaintiff's witness made a veiled and apparently inadvertent reference to addiction.

Nearly every witness in the lawsuit against five tobacco companies had struggled with that restriction in the first two weeks of the trial.

Recht retained the case's class-action status and said the issue of addiction to smoking could be discussed in a future trial. He had said Friday that his options were to declare a mistrial or strip the case of its class-action status — reducing it to the two named plaintiffs instead of the 250,000 represented in the lawsuit.

In hindsight, the judge said Monday, "There is no question that issues relating to nicotine, nicotine delivery, addiction, habit and the ability to quit smoking all are and should be an integral part of this case."

He suggested that, in restructuring their case for a future trial, the smokers' attorneys might focus on product design and liability.

Last week, he said, "I guarantee I'm smarter now than I was a month ago. As the case goes on, you get a clearer picture, and it is clear to me: Addiction is, I believe, a necessary element in this case — the inability to quit."

The lawsuit, which targets R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co.; Philip Morris Cos.; Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp.; Liggett Group Inc.; and Lorillard Tobacco Co., is the first class-action of its kind to make it to trial in this country.

Simple arithmetic cause of voting discrepancies

PHILADELPHIA — It wasn't hanging chads or butterfly ballots that led to errors in tallying votes in Philadelphia last November. It was gaffes involving simple arithmetic.

A newspaper's analysis of city voting records found glaring errors in arithmetic — occurring mostly when votes were recorded and tallied by hand — that cost the two major-party presidential candidates more than 3,000 votes combined.

In one West Philadelphia polling place, workers recorded 159 more votes for president than were cast. In another, former Vice President Al Gore was given 207 votes when he actually got 270.

In a division in the city's Northeast, one-fourth of all presidential votes were not included in the final count because workers did not add the results correctly.

"I can't emphasize enough that I've got no excuse for that," Deputy Elections Commissioner Edward Schulgen told The Philadelphia Inquirer.

The city, which is preparing to spend about $21 million on computerized voting machines, now uses mechanical-lever machines that are no longer manufactured.

Philadelphia plans to buy touch-screen, electronic voting machines this year that will provide near-instant returns. The machines should be in use in November.

Hale Library recently added 99 computers, including 30 on the second floor. The computers tie all K-State resources together to help students.

Library gets new technology

By ANGIE JOHNSON
Kansas State Collegian

There always has been the opportunity for Georgette Garlick, senior in psychology, to search for specific articles and check her e-mail at Hale Library, but the computers had limitations.

"I became confused when looking for resources for papers," Garlick said.

Until now, students could not even type a paper at Hale, but now Garlick and all students can find exactly what they are looking for in one place through a new system called Infocommons.

Infocommons brings together all of the libraries' databases and software together into one program. Students now can type a paper and include sources from the Internet and library information. It serves as a quicker way to find resources and use specific software.

"We find this to be a solution to many conflicts that students find when using the resources at Hale," Jan Crow, library marketing and public relations.

The Infocommons workstations are identical to Computing and Network Services university computing labs on campus.

K-State's Faculty Senate and Student Senate proposed the idea of Infocommons. It is the marriage of information, technology, and interpretive/instructional resources into one high-capacity computing tool.

"It is a greatly improved service to students," Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries, said.

More than two-thirds of the funding for the infocommons comes from Student Technology Fee funds, and the university repairs and restoration fund contributes the remainder.

As Hale Library continues planning to upgrade technology and allow simplicity for students, it purchased 99 new computers and added the infocommons program.

Along with the convenience of Infocommons, the library purchased 95 new front-line desktop computer terminals with 19-inch monitors that have been dispersed throughout Hale. An additional four laptop computers, which can be checked out for use at the library for four hours at a time, were purchased.

"Last year we constantly had students wondering where programs like Microsoft Word or WordPerfect were, and they just were not available," Hobrock said. "We now provide those programs and many others in the library and at other locations on campus."

A total of 257 new computers have been distributed among Hale, the K-State Student Union, Academic Learning Center, Lockett Learning Center, all residence hall computer labs and all CNS labs in Dickens, Justin, Seaton and Nichols halls. Each of the desktop and laptop computers contain the same equipment, software and resources.

"We are working to incorporate students' needs and the distribution serves as a major advantage as we encourage them to seek print resources and have access to both electronic and media capabilities," Laurel Littrell, reference librarian, said.

Students now wanting to use DVDs, compact discs, or have a class with a course Web page including sound, now can be supported at Hale. The Faculty and Student senates are investigating wireless technology.

"I use the campus computers on a daily basis, and they have always been fast and accessible, but with the new technology I see myself using them for even more purposes," Russell Wohler, freshman in secondary education, said.

Red Cross to help with gas bills

By AMY MORGAN
Kansas State Collegian

The American Red Cross is offering a program to low-income families in Kansas who need assistance in paying their energy bills this winter.

The Kansas Corporation Commission approved a Kansas Gas Service Company proposal for a reduction of 50 percent in the cost of gas for qualified low-income households. The "Winter Relief 2001 Gas Assistance Program" was created as a result of a $750,000 grant from the ONEOK Foundation, a corporation that administers gas service to Kansas and Oklahoma.

The GAP program was approved Jan. 3 by the KCC, and applications were available Jan. 16. Applications will not be accepted until Feb. 1, but at this time the Kansas Capital Area Chapter in Topeka, which is handling applications for Riley County, has received about 250 calls a day. Tina Labellarte, executive director, said.

"Low-income families will receive credit on their bill only for the cost of gas, as well as a small grant to help with immediate needs," Labellarte said.

Applications for the GAP program will be accepted until either March 31 or until 7,500 KGS households are qualified.

To qualify for the income-based program, customers must be living between 130 to 200 percent of poverty according to federal guidelines, must not be eligible to receive Low Income Energy Assistance Program funds or be expecting or receiving any other utility assistance from other local agencies.

"This program meets the needs of the working and the poor," Labellarte said.

The Manhattan Red Cross chapter also has applications available for local utility assistance programs funded primarily by the City of Manhattan, Clay Myers-Bowman, executive director, said.

Myers-Bowman said the Red Cross is in the process of going before the city commission in February to request an additional $8,000 in funding to help families who have difficulty paying their utility bills.

In addition to the utility assistance from the Red Cross, the Social and Rehabilitation Services also offers a statewide program called the Low Income Energy Assistance Program for families living at or below 130 percent of poverty.

Sondra Huey, support program administrator for Riley County SRS said LIEAP was started in 1980 to help low-income customers with utility costs.

Applications were available Jan. 16, and will be accepted up to 5 p.m. March 30. Customers may contact the SRS at (785) 776-4011 or pick up applications at the SRS office in Manhattan, Huey said.

Customers can contact KCAC by phone at (866) 990-9910 or by mail request at 1221 SW 17th St., Topeka, Kan., 66604, to receive a GAP application.

Carruth found guilty on 3 counts

By PAUL NOWELL
The Associated Press

CHARLOTTE, N.C. — Former NFL player Rae Carruth was sentenced Monday to at least 18 years and 11 months in prison for his role in the 1999 shooting death of his pregnant girlfriend.

Superior Court Judge Charles Lammi sentenced Carruth after hearing emotional testimony from the parents of Cherica Adams, who was eight months pregnant when she was shot four times in November 1999. She died a month later.

Cherica Adams' mother, Sandra, said she forgives Carruth, but "in no way do I think he should get off easy for what he has done."

"He's already gotten the greatest of mercy — his life is spared," she said. "Let him take the punishment not of a little boy, but of a man one time. Let him know he needs some help."

She also testified that her year-old grandson Chancellor, delivered prematurely by emergency Caesarean section after the shooting, is developmentally disabled and has cerebral palsy.

"He can't hold onto his bottle. ... He has trouble even holding onto the rattle," she said. "He's not anywhere near taking his first step. The doctors are telling me he might not take a first step until he is 3 years old or older."

Prosecutors said Carruth set up the attack on Adams, to avoid paying child support, using his white Ford Expedition to block Adams' car so a hired gunman could shoot her.

Carruth — convicted of conspiracy to commit murder, shooting into an occupied vehicle, and using an instrument with the intent to destroy an unborn child — is to serve at least 18 years, 11 months, with a maximum of 24 years and four months. He will get credit for the roughly 14 months he was jailed awaiting trial.

Carruth stared at the judge, showing no emotion, as Lammi announced the sentence. Defense lawyer David Rudolf immediately filed notice of appeal.

Adams' parents and other relatives embraced one another as the hearing ended.

Rudolf asked the judge to consider mitigating circumstances, saying Carruth had no criminal record prior to the shooting, and served as a mentor to youngsters.

Prosecutor Gentry Caudill argued that Carruth played a lead role in the crime and took advantage of Adams' misplaced trust in him. He also said that Carruth has shown not one ounce of remorse, for Adams' death.

"He offered no assistance as Cherica lay dying from those wounds," Caudill said.

Lammi rejected a defense motion to vacate Carruth's convictions, which Rudolf said were inconsistent with the jury's decision Friday to acquit Carruth of first-degree murder. The verdict implied that some jurors gave up their reasonable doubt about the prosecution's case in order to reach a compromise verdict, Rudolf argued.

But prosecutor David Graham said previous court rulings have allowed such verdicts, and the judge ruled there was enough evidence to convict on the three counts.

On the Topic

How should K-State conserve energy?

If we have such high energy costs, why don't we consider shutting the stadium lights off every now and then.

To conserve energy maybe we should not use Throckmorton as a sauna.

I've said it before, and I'll say it again: let's turn off the lights in the stadium.

Off the Topic

For God's sake, the man started blubbering at his own inauguration. Is this what we have four years to look forward to?

I'm trying to figure out what I saw less of at Saturday night's class. Good referee calls or Wefald standing up to cheer.

I made six out of 10 free throws at the Knights of Columbus free throw shoot-out in Hoxie, Kan., when I was a sixth grader. I would be one of the greatest assets to the Kansas State basketball team.

Football is over in a week. Then what the hell are we supposed to do?

Saying you don't need an adviser to enroll is as dumb as saying you don't need an accountant to do your taxes. I mean, after all, the government publishes a book, too, about how tax law is supposed to work, and sure it's only the size of the yellow pages. But anybody can read it, right?

I guess my attendance at the women's basketball games isn't appreciated since I'm not greek. Thanks a lot, girls.

Who cares about Bill Clinton's presidential run? We're in the Bush era now.

I think I'm having déjà vu while I'm watching ESPN's SportsCenter. Wait a minute. What? Rae Carruth only gets 19 years? Hmmm. Yep, I guess it does remind me of O.J.

I may be a loser engineer, so my opinion may not mean squat to you, but Monkey Boy sucks. I want Dilbert back.

I just wanted to apologize to Project Wellness because it's Monday at 4:27, and I'm on drink eight and my roommate is on drink nine. And note to the 1,192 freshmen that were surveyed: it isn't sent home to your parents.

Carpe Diem. Seize the Day. Keira Mann had an awesome article. Anybody who knocks it is a pathetic loser.

Question for Thursday: What about the Bush Administration are you looking forward to?

BEATING THE CLOCK

Eating, sleeping habits ways to save time

As a student here at K-State I've learned how it feels not to have enough of something. I'm not talking about money, food, clothing, the very air I breathe or other various and sundry essentials of life. I'm referring to the Great Equalizer, Time.

You know what I mean because you've experienced the same thing. Between school, parties and work, you just can't seem to find the time to do all the things that you want to. "There just isn't time," you tell yourself, shaking your head in sadness. I can empathize with you. I, too, have experienced what one expert in the field calls "The Time Crunch."

Having a pity party is all well and good. I propose, however, to do more in this column than simply commiserate with you. I thought I'd share some of my techniques for beating time at its own game. How can you find enough time to do everything you want to do? The key lies in turning your habits into time-saving opportunities. With some effort and creativity, you can save all kinds of time, without even significantly changing your daily routine. Here are some ideas:

Eating. If you consume three meals a day, and spend an average of 30 minutes on each meal, you are frittering away 1 1/2 hours of your time every day. Assuming that you live 70 years, you will squander more than 50 months of your precious life in providing nourishment for yourself. While this isn't necessarily wrong (if you're a hedonist), there's definitely a better way.

If you eat as quickly as you possibly can, and only consume foods that are easy to eat, you can cut down on the time you spend eating by at least a factor of six. For best results, try applesauce, yogurt and liquefied tofu. Their textures may disgust you at first, but the extra time gained is well worth the sacrifice.

Sleeping. Most adult human beings need between 6 and 8 hours of sleep per day to function properly. At first, this may seem like a gross waste of time, but believe you me: it's not. If you try to deprive yourself of sleep, you will probably end up doing very silly things, such as writing inane, almost incomprehensible columns about saving time.

Bottom line: sleep cannot, and must not, be compromised. The trick is to sleep at the right times. If you take a 20-minute nap every hour, you can get 8 hours of sleep a day without disrupting your busy lifestyle. For example, you can go to the laundromat, start washing your clothes, and sleep for 20 minutes while they're going through the cycles. You can run full-speed from class to class so that the 10 minute class-change period will not go to waste, and you can certainly sleep for at least ten additional minutes during each lecture. With creativity, you'll easily be able to grab 20 minutes of sleep per hour.

Being with people. People seem to be the biggest waste of time for most of us. You must avoid spending valuable time with other humans if you're going to be a time-enhanced person like me. My method for doing this is fairly simple: I study a lot. This is useful for several reasons. First of all, people tend to think of students as "no fun" and "killjoys." This leads them not to seek our company. Secondly, if they do invite us to waste time with them, we can simply say, "Sorry. Gotta study for the ol' midterms, ya know. Heh-heh." And then we can run away from the time-wasting fiends like frightened rodents in the night. Thirdly, studying keeps us from actively seeking new friends, which reduces wasted time enormously.

Just follow these simple steps, and you'll have all kinds of time on your hands within mere days. Sure, there are those who argue that my plan is harmful to humanity, but their priorities are obviously all wrong. Which would you rather have: a wasted, quickly passing life, or a time-enriched life with lots of extra moments to stop and smell the roses? Trust me, you'll enjoy time a whole lot more when you hold onto it than you will when you waste it.

It's funny how most of the extra time just kind of clumps itself into Friday and Saturday nights. I'm not complaining, though, because there are lots of people online to play Quake 3 on those nights. Now if you'll excuse me, it's been almost 40 minutes since I last slept, and I'm bushed.

Columnist outlines questions for Ashcroft hearing

If I had been a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee participating in the hearings considering John Ashcroft's qualifications to be the U.S. attorney general, my line of questioning would have gone as follows:

"Sen. Ashcroft, as far as experience, there are few who are more qualified than yourself; Missouri auditor, Missouri assistant attorney general, Missouri attorney general, Missouri governor and Missouri senator. However, character is also an important qualification, and I have a few character questions I'd like to ask.

"It is well known that you are an ardent opponent of abortion. You've said that the Supreme Court decided wrongly in Roe v. Wade. You've supported a constitutional amendment that would outlaw abortion even in cases of rape and incest. Throughout your public life, you've sought to restrict Roe v. Wade as much as possible. Many on the ultra-religious right, to which you belong, believe abortion is murder and consider the thousands of abortions performed every year in the United States genocide.

"You've testified before this committee that as U.S. attorney general you will enforce the laws of the land 'fairly and aggressively.' How can you, in good conscience, justify to yourself enforcing laws you find morally abhorrent?

"There has been a lot of discussion about whether you're a racist. On one hand, you've appointed, nominated and supported the nominations of numerous minorities to various government and judicial positions. You have had, and continue to have, high-ranking staff members who are black.

"Yet you've vigorously fought against a voluntary desegregation plan for the public schools in St. Louis even after a federal court ruling found, and appellate courts upheld, that the state of Missouri was the 'primary constitutional wrongdoer in perpetuating segregated schools in St. Louis, both by denying blacks an equal education in the past and doing little to remedy the situation later.' While serving as Missouri attorney general, your continual delay and failure to comply with court orders nearly found you in contempt. U.S. District Judge William Hungate wrote in a court order, 'The state, as a matter of deliberate policy, decided to defy the authority of this court.'

"In 1999, you gave a commencement address and received an honorary degree at Bob Jones University — an institution that teaches that the Catholic Church is a satanic cult, Pope John Paul II is the Antichrist and until the year 2000 prohibited interracial dating.

"It has also become well known that you gave an interview to 'The Southern Partisan Magazine' — a neo-Confederate publication that regularly vilifies President Lincoln and makes disparaging remarks against blacks, Asians, Hispanics, Jews and numerous other ethnic groups. At the time, you may not have known about the magazine's political stance, yet you knew enough to praise it for 'defending patriots like Robert E. Lee, Stonewall Jackson and Jefferson Davis.' (Just for your edification: the secession of the southern states was the greatest act of treachery in U.S. history, thus men such as Lee, Jackson and Davis are actually traitors.)

"In light of the above examples, can you appreciate why many believe you to be a racist or at least racially insensitive? You've said that you abhor racism, but racism is more than a belief that not all ethnic groups are equal. It's a sentiment, a sentiment you've exhibited in your past. What's your definition of racism?

"Going back to the desegregation case, you defied the law then as state attorney general, why should we believe you'll not defied the law as U.S. attorney general?

"Going back to the Bob Jones University situation, you stated in March of 2000 that you were unaware of the principles and teachings of this institution. This was after presidential candidate George W. Bush publicly apologized to Archbishop John O'Connor for not criticizing the school while he was there. Are you completely unaware of current events? Do you believe that one who is unaware is qualified to be attorney general?

"Returning to 'The Southern Partisan Magazine' interview, when Sen. Joseph Biden (D-Del.) asked you during this hearing if you have now come to believe that this publication is racist, you responded that you didn't know enough about it to say. Your interview in this magazine has been big news for the last couple of weeks. You had to have known you would be asked about it. Are you telling this committee that you came unprepared? Do you believe a person who would come to such an important hearing unprepared is qualified to be attorney general?

"And finally I turn to your scuttling of Judge Ronnie White's nomination to a federal bench in 1999. Here's a man who has been a state legislator and the first black justice on the Missouri Supreme Court, highly respected by all the other members of the Missouri Supreme Court, which include justices you yourself appointed. Yet you called Judge White 'pro-criminal' and 'anti-death penalty' in spite of the fact that Judge White affirmed the death penalty in 41 of 59 cases. Of the 18 cases he voted against imposing the death penalty, 10 were unanimous court decisions that included judges you yourself appointed. On death penalty cases, Judge White has voted with your appointees 95 percent of the time. There are three justices on the state Supreme Court who you appointed that have a greater percentage of overturning death penalty cases than Judge White.

"Your sole example of Judge White being pro-criminal dealt with a death-penalty case in which the defendant was of questionable mental acuity and had incompetent counsel. Conservative U.S. Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia, whom you have praised, on no less than three occasions has returned death penalty cases to lower courts for the same reason.

"Referring to Judge White as pro-criminal and anti-death penalty has been called a lie and sheer demagoguery.

"Did you do this out of spite, since White as a legislator stymied your anti-abortion legislation? Did you do this for personal political gain, since at the time you were running against the anti-death-penalty Mel Carnahan for senate? Or did you do this strictly for ideological reasons?

"Do you consider a person who defames another out of spite or for personal gain to be qualified to be attorney general?

"Regardless of everything else, since your brand of ultra-conservatism is diametrically opposed to nearly everyone else's in the United States, should we do as you do and reject your nomination strictly for ideological reasons?

"Thank you, Mr. Senator, for your time."

Bush blocks U.S. funding to family-planning groups; plans to protect all people

By SANDRA SOBIERAJ
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Bush, vowing to protect every person at every stage and season of life, said Monday he will take swift action to restrict U.S. funds to international family-planning groups involved in abortion.

Bush was expected to issue the order, among the first policy moves of the new Republican administration, as early as Monday afternoon, the same day abortion opponents staged their annual march on Washington.

"Yes, I am. Soon," Bush said when asked by a reporter if he was going to reverse the Clinton administration's position on unrestricted family-planning aid.

On his first workday in the White House, Bush also gave a written statement to marchers on the 28th anniversary of the Supreme Court's Roe v. Wade decision that legalized abortion.

"The promises of our Declaration of Independence are not just for the strong, the independent or the healthy. They are for everyone, including unborn children," his statement said. "We share a great goal, to work toward a day when every child is welcomed in life and protected in law ... to build a culture of life, affirming that every person at every stage and season of life, is created equal in God's image."

Abortion-rights supporter Kate Michelman saw it as Bush's latest act of war on women's reproductive rights, following his nomination of staunch abortion opponents to key Cabinet posts — former Sen. John Ashcroft for attorney general and former Wisconsin Gov. Tommy Thompson as secretary of health and human services.

Bush is using his presidential powers quite aggressively already to undermine a woman's right to choose and clear a pathway to the overturning of Roe v. Wade, Michelman said. "I think it's a harbinger of things to come — Supreme Court appointments, judicial appointments ... There's quite a bit of harm that can be done to women's reproductive rights."

"He clearly is bending to the will of the far right on these issues. He so quickly shed his facade and his cloak of moderation on this issue," she said.

White House press secretary Ari Fleischer refused to speculate on the timing. "It's an important issue. Executive orders are possible at any time," Fleischer said.

Current law bans the use of U.S. funds for any abortions in foreign countries. Former Presidents Reagan and Bush further banned U.S. aid to international groups that use their own money to support abortion — either through performing the surgery, counseling on abortion as a family-planning option or lobbying foreign governments on abortion policy — in what became known as the Mexico City policy because it was announced by Reagan at a 1984 population conference there.

President Clinton repealed the policy, which abortion-rights advocates call the global gag rule, two days after he entered office in 1993. It went through several subsequent iterations as the Democratic president reached different compromises with congressional Republicans.

U.S. funds will flow unrestricted to international family-planning groups Feb. 15 unless the new president acts by executive order to impose abortion restrictions, as Bush has decided to do.

Pro-life lawmakers who agreed in last year's spending bill to let U.S.-assisted family-planning groups do whatever they wanted with their own money gambled that Bush would be elected.

With the Bush White House signaling a decision Monday, abortion opponents celebrated.

"This means that the U.S. government will no longer be using taxpayer dollars to try to legalize abortion in countries in Latin America, Africa and Muslim countries in which the people are strongly opposed to abortion and believe in the protection of unborn children," said Douglas Johnson, legislative director for National Right to Life Committee.

Bush's written statement to the March for Life was delivered by Rep. Chris Smith, R-N.J., a leader of the pro-life movement, to activists gathered on the National Mall.

Asked why Bush wasn't presenting the statement himself, either in person or by telephone, Fleischer said the president chose the manner in which to deliver his message, and it signifies that he has an important statement to make.

The politically and emotionally charged issue of abortion promised to test Bush's ability to deliver on his oft-repeated promise to unite Democrats and Republicans.

Since the election was decided, Bush has answered questions on the issue with a relatively tepid reminder: "As you know, I campaigned as a pro-life candidate."

But while he might not himself engage in the sound and fury of the activists who back him, Bush has nominated a staunch abortion opponent for attorney general, former Sen. John Ashcroft, and signaled quick action to reverse Clinton policies supporting access to abortion.

White House Chief of Staff Andrew Card served notice Sunday that several key abortion policies would be quickly reviewed by the Bush administration.

As for what the president might think of First Lady Laura Bush's recent statement that she does not think Roe v. Wade should be overturned, Fleischer said Monday, "It's a personal matter."

Bush halts Clinton's last-minute actions

By KAREN GULLO
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — In its final hours, the Clinton administration rushed through dozens of little-noticed initiatives — from $2.75 billion in housing grants for the poor to new restrictions on tour flights over national parks, records show.

There even was one allowing a new, smaller hole for Grade A Swiss cheese.

But before many of the rules and regulations could become official, President Bush halted them.

The last-minute flurry left some in the federal bureaucracy wondering Monday what they could enforce — and couldn't.

"We're trying to figure it out," said Megan Durham, a spokeswoman at the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service.

The agency needed to know whether new maps outlining protected habitats for two endangered species — the Peninsula bighorn sheep and the arroyo southwestern toad — would take effect.

Bush's moratorium, one of his first after taking the Oath of Office on Saturday, stopped rules and regulations that had not yet been published in the Federal Register.

The Bush administration intends to review them and might scrap or alter those it opposes. Bush also has promised to review all executive orders already signed by Clinton.

The Office of the Federal Register was flooded Friday with stacks of new policies and regulations Clinton officials hoped would be published this week.

Instead, workers at the publication rifled through the stacks Monday and attached notices to them, declaring that the rules and policies were being called back for review under the orders of White House Chief of Staff Andrew Card.

"Consistent with the directions of Andrew Card ... I am reiterating the request ... that the documents identified on the enclosed list, which have not been published in the Federal Register, be withdrawn," read the notice clipped to several documents from the Department of Housing and Urban Development.

The chaotic process is nothing new for workers at the Federal Register. New administrations frequently table their predecessor's last-minute work.

Ronald Reagan did it to Jimmy Carter in 1981, and Clinton blocked some of the last actions of Bush's father in 1993.

"It hit the fan," said Steve Karsteter, an editor at the Federal Register. "There was other work that didn't get done."

Clinton publicized a handful of his last-minute orders that angered Republicans — he put 58 million acres of federal land off limits to road building and logging and issued regulations imposing new workplace safety rules, for instance.

But dozens of rules were pushed through without fanfare until stopped by Bush.

■ A notice making $2.75 billion in HUD funds available for housing, community development and empowerment programs and vouchers to help the poor rent housing.

■ A Federal Aviation Administration rule that allowed for restrictions on helicopters and airplanes providing sightseeing tours over national parks. Such flights became controversial because of complaints they disturbed the parks' natural tranquility. Steve Bassett of the U.S.

Air Tour Association, which represents tour operators, said the group would not seek changes to the rule.

■ HUD's final get-tough policy to kick drug dealers and criminals out of public housing. Tenants would have the right to dispute criminal records used to justify their eviction under the rule.

■ HUD guidelines making it easier for non-English speakers to apply for federal benefits, including hiring interpreters and providing translations of written material. The rules would apply to state and local governments and any organization that receives HUD money.

■ A U.S. Trade Representative's rule requiring agricultural agreements forged with the World Trade Organization be reviewed for their impact on the environment.

Bush administration officials were uncertain of the exact number of federal rules that ultimately might be stopped by the moratorium.

"All regulations that had not been published have been affected by this," Ari Fleischer, Bush's spokesman, said.

Many of the last-minute rules were part of the normal course of government business while others gave Clinton a chance to raise the barrier to change policies, said Norman Ornstein of the American Enterprise Institute, a Washington think tank.

"You lay down markers of what you think policy should be like," Ornstein said. "If the new administration declines to follow those markers, you've set up a debate."

One relatively uncontroversial rule sought by cheesemakers from the Agriculture Department got caught in the fray. It would have allowed smaller holes to keep Grade A Swiss cheese from getting tangled in high-speed slicing machines.

Football players receive annual honors

By MICHAEL NOLL

Kansas State Collegian

K-State said farewell to the most successful football senior class in NCAA history Sunday night.

In the class' five years of eligibility, the Cats were 53-10 and won 11 games each of the last four years, one of only two teams in history to do so. To honor the team, fans gathered Sunday evening in McCain Auditorium for K-State's annual awards ceremony.

The following players received honors.

Most Valuable Player — Offense

Quincy Morgan (Sr., WR, Garland, Texas)

Jonathan Beasley (Sr., QB, Glendale, Ariz.)

Most Valuable Player — Defense

Cats compete in Georgia Invitational

By MICHAEL NOLL

Kansas State Collegian

Now K-State's tennis team knows what it takes to hang with the best in the country.

After a nearly three-month lay-off, the Cats competed in the Georgia Invitational, and played host to No. 2 Georgia, last weekend.

"We were thrown into the fire this weekend," head coach Steve Bietau said. "We really got a taste of what a high level of competition is like.

Hopefully we can use this weekend to set a higher standard for ourselves and our team going into this season."

The Cats might have faced high-powered tennis squads, but they didn't get steamrolled. Leading the way for K-State, junior Alena Jecminkova advanced as far as the quarterfinals before losing 6-3, 6-0 to Georgia's Lori Grey.

Prior to that match, however, Jecminkova received a bye and then won four straight sets to defeat Illinois' Simone King and Georgia Tech's Debbi Reynolds.

"Alena has played solid tennis so far," Bietau said. "She made it easy because she played well."

The Cats would knock off one Georgia player when sophomore Petra Sedlmajerova won her first match 7-6, 6-4 over Christa Grey. Sedlmajerova would end up going 2-2 for the tournament.

"Petra struggled in her first two matches but played much better in her consolation round," Bietau said.

In other singles action, junior Eva Novotna and freshman Paulina Castillejos both lost their opening matches. Novotna did manage to take Illinois' Jenny McGaffigan to three sets, but Castillejos was blanked 6-0, 6-0 by Zsafia Golopencza of Armstrong State.

In doubles play, Jecminkova and junior Eva Novotna went 1-1, and Castillejos and freshman Hayley McIver lost their opening match.

The Cats will return to action this weekend with matches against Mississippi and New Mexico at New Mexico.

As a senior at Olathe North, Darren Sproles rushed for 2,485 yards and 49 touchdowns. In the 6A state championship game, the tailback ran for 281 yards and five touchdowns on just 28 carries in North's 42-7 romp over Manhattan.

"I am really looking forward to playing at Kansas State," Sproles said, according to Rivals.com. "I feel I will fit in there."

Jesse Tetuan rushed for 1,691 yards and 27 touchdowns in his senior season at Hayden High School in Topeka, Kan.

"They called and offered me at school, and I orally committed right there," Tetuan said, according to Rivals.com. "Kansas State has the whole package. It's close to home, they have a great program and I like their coaches."

"I'm not sure where I'll play, and neither are the coaches. They've told me they're looking at wide receiver or defensive back, but we'll see when we get there. The important thing is that I'm a Wildcat."

Dralinn Burks, an All-Conference selection at Trinity Valley Community College, was a driving force in helping TVCC tailback Chavis McCollister have an MVP year. Burks chose K-State over Kansas, Oklahoma and Baylor.

"I went on my visit, and I just fit in," Burks said, according to Rivals.com. "My dad was high on K-State, and they have a good program toward my major."

Tank Reese recorded 11 sacks at Hutchinson Community College but also plays fullback. In fact, despite weighing almost 300 pounds, he actually prefers the offensive side of the ball.

"I'm good at both positions, I guess," Reese said, according to Rivals.com. "I kind of prefer fullback, but either spot will be fine with me."

Henry Bryant, an All-American defensive end from Garden City Community College, chose K-State over the likes of Oklahoma and LSU.

"I felt more comfortable around the people from Kansas State," Bryant said, according to Rivals.com. "It's a perfect fit for me. I'll play defensive end there, and I fit into their scheme."

A teammate of Bryant's also might end up at K-State, wideout C.J. Jones.

Marc Dunn is just the second Junior College First Team All-American K-State has ever signed. Running back Frank Murphy was the first.

As a sophomore at Ricks College in Utah, Dunn threw for 4,351 total yards and 42 touchdowns, averaged almost 400 yards per game and had a 60.4 completion percentage.

He maintains every single passing record at Ricks College.

Columnist speculates on outcome of Sunday's Super Bowl matchup

I'm not much for predictions.

Every chimpanzee with a television and a sliver of working gray matter has made a prediction about Super Bowl XXXV.

With all of those forecasts floating around, I've decided to stay away from traditional methods of predicting a winner. Think of this as the aromatherapy of postseason analysis.

I won't predict.

I'm going to speculate.

You see, every pundit this side of Poughkeepsie thinks this Super Bowl will be closer than my brother and his date on prom night.

The bookies in Sin City have made the Ravens a three-point favorite, but I've done some investigating myself, and I think I've got the edge. How many bookies can tell you the Ravens lost both times they played teams with more than two cheerleaders named Jennifer (Miami and Tennessee)?

Not many, and that's my point.

So let me evaluate this game for you because just like the lanky girl with braces at the junior high dance, some things are getting overlooked.

For starters, the backup quarterback for the Giants, Jason Garrett, is a Princeton graduate. This is important because the Ravens lost their only game against an opponent that had a quarterback on the roster from an Ivy League conference (Jay Fiedler from Dartmouth).

Even more important is that the starting quarterback for the Giants, Kerry Collins, was born Dec. 12, 1972. The Ravens lost one game to every starting quarterback they played born between Sept. 13, 1968 (Washington's Rob Johnson) and Feb. 14, 1973 (Tennessee's Steve McNair).

The Super Bowl starts approximately at 5 p.m. CST, and the Ravens have failed to score a touchdown in a game that kicked off later than 3:15 p.m.

The Ravens are 2-1 against teams in the NFC East but only 2-2 against teams from the original 13 colonies.

The Ravens recorded 11 of their 15 wins against teams from states that cast their electoral votes for Bush, and New York went heavily for Gore.

Unfortunately for the Giants, the Ravens have won every game away from Baltimore in a stadium with fewer than 73,000 seats, and Tampa Bay's Raymond James Stadium reaches capacity at 66,000.

Both teams lost to Washington and Tennessee.

Both teams beat Dallas, Jacksonville, Arizona and Cleveland.

The Giants are 2-0 in Super Bowls winning in 1987 and 1990. They also won the NFL championship in 1927.

Finally, the Ravens lost every game in which Dan Marino's jersey was retired at halftime.

I know this analysis seems questionable. My numbers point in a different direction than the numbers both teams put up during the regular season.

Giants defensive end Michael Strahan has made the prediction that this Super Bowl is going to be a defensive struggle. If that's true, the Giants might be in trouble. The one element that hasn't failed to show up on game day is the Baltimore defense. In their 19 games the Ravens have only given up more than 300 total yards of offense five times, and they won each of those five games. They've only allowed their opponent to gain more than 100 yards on the ground 4 times.

I know, we've all heard the stats on the Ravens D. They allowed fewer points than any team in modern history. They posted shut-outs in 25 percent of their games. They played seven games in gunny sacks and blindfolds and still only gave up 23 yards and a safety.

These statistics are especially foreboding when matched up against the numbers produced by the Giants offense.

Sure, the 41-0 dismantling of the Vikings was impressive, but this isn't an offense that shows up every game. The "Thunder and Lightning" running duo of Tiki Barber and Ron Dayne has been an awful lot like "Partly cloudy and scattered showers" on more than one occasion.

In their four losses, the offensive production has been close to dismal.

It seems that a huge question for this game is not whether the defense will show up for the Ravens, but whether the New York offense will rain or shine.

That's a question that won't be answered until Sunday.

So I'll have to comfort myself with the knowledge that the Ravens lost every time they played teams with cheerleaders named Sach, Latarshar, Emeraude or Laverne.

While the Giants' are without a cheerleader named Sach, I speculate they will be the ones getting their fingers sized for a championship ring come Sunday.

Of course, the only thing I know to be absolute is that every time I've made a prediction in print, it's been wrong.

WHO: Krista Bright, K-State Juggling Club President

Krista Bright joined the K-State Juggling Club her freshman year when it began and since has increased her involvement with the organization. She now is the president.

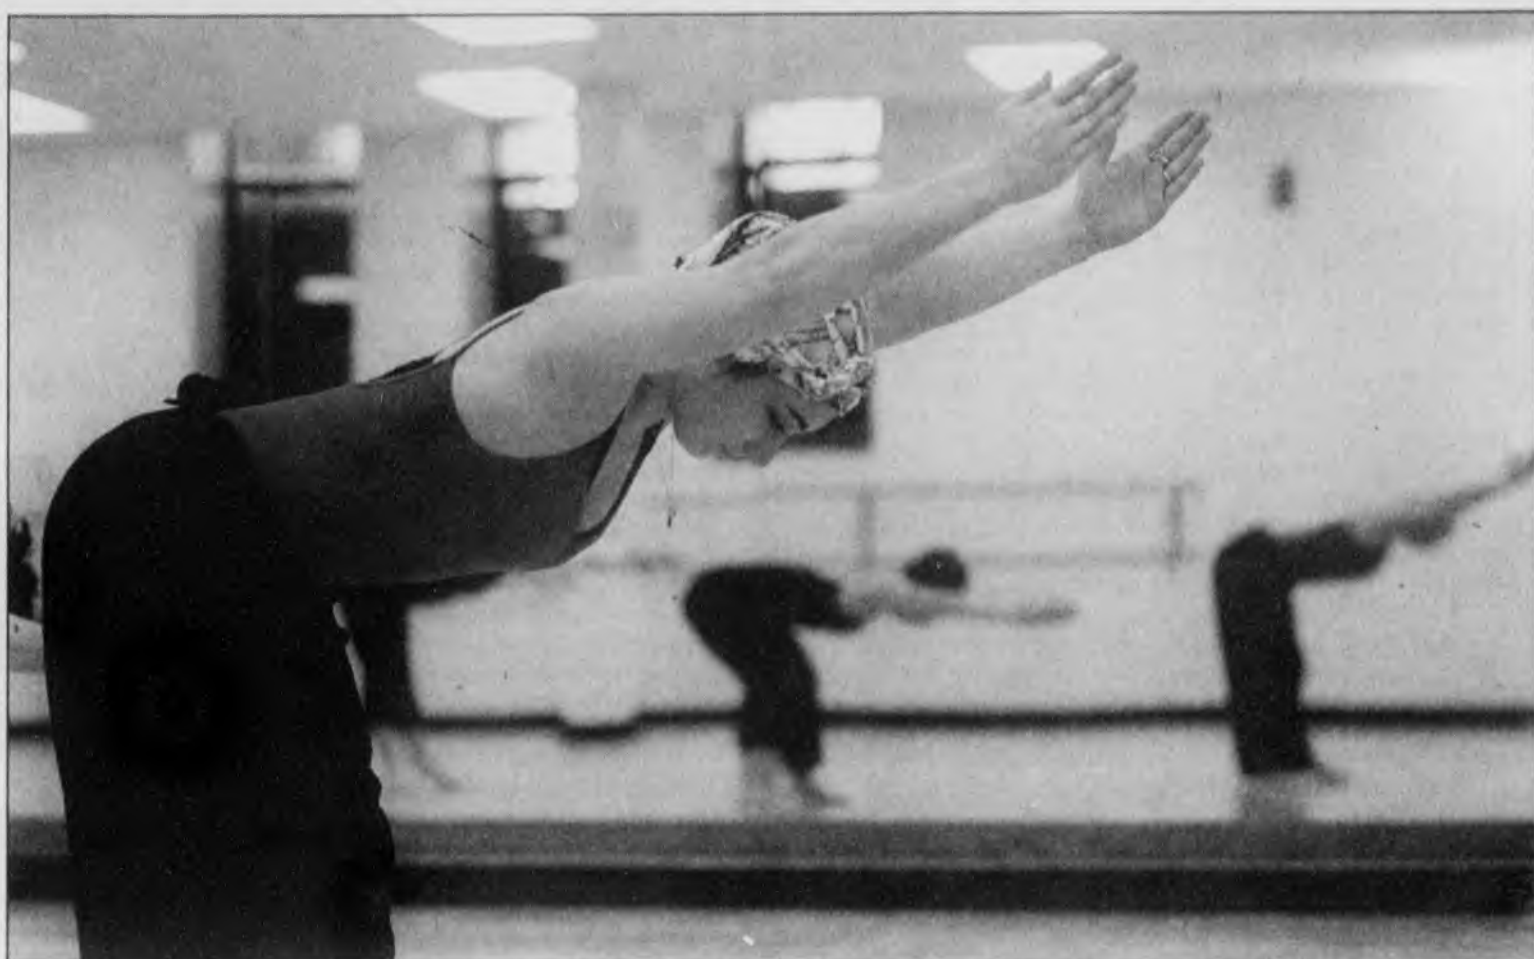

Club members make appearances at festivals and do volunteer activities. Bright said they always are open to opportunities to perform. The members' levels of experience vary greatly. Some can perform advanced tricks, Bright said.

Juggling is not only a form of entertainment but a way to relieve tension, Bright said.

"I find it relaxing to juggle because when you're juggling you can't think about that test you have to study for or that project that's due tomorrow," she said. "It's a welcome mental break."

Bright said the club always is looking for new members of any skill level. To join, students can send e-mail to juggle@ksu.edu, visit the Web site at www.ksu.edu/juggle or call 770-3912.

Dance company combines different styles to challenge and motivate dancers

By JJ DUNCAN

Kansas State Collegian

Control is the power or authority to control or command. That authority is exactly what Marcie Mamura exhibits over the muscles of her body as she bends them to her will.

Mamura, junior in dance, is just one of the members of the K-State Repertory Dance Company who exhibits the muscle control needed to express music on a physical level. Hours of practice, buckets of sweat and tedious attention to detail can be discouraging, but it takes determination to be a dancer, Mamura said.

"Dance is challenging because it takes self-motivation to do it," she said. "It's not always the most pleasant thing because it can be painful, it can be frustrating and sometimes even discouraging. When you feel like you just want to take a hot shower and it's hard just to walk up and down the stairs, that's when you've got to keep going."

The KSRDC was formed just last semester with eight members. Extensive time commitments and other factors have left the company with five remaining members, Wanda Ebright, director of the KSRDC, said.

Formed in part to help attract students to K-State's dance program, the company makes the program more active and more visible, Ebright, assistant professor of dance, said. Ebright said she enjoys directing the company because of her enthusiasm for the undertaking and her experience in dance.

As a second-year instructor at K-State, Ebright said when she took the position at K-State she knew she would have the opportunity to start the company.

"As a director, I find joy and pleasure from seeing the students take on many different styles," she said. "The variety of styles sometimes pull out personalities in the dancers that not even they knew they had. It's interesting to see the progression from what they think their strong points are to the well-rounded performers they can become."

Appreciation for Ebright's direction is evident in how the dancers view her. Jenny Ludes, freshman in dance, said Ebright has taken on a big responsibility and made the first year for the company productive.

MATT STAMEY/Collegian

Marcie Mamura, junior in dance, goes over some steps while practicing Friday afternoon in Nichols Hall. Mamura is part of a Repertory Dance Committee.

Erinn Thompson, sophomore in dance, said Ebright's breadth makes her a perfect choice for director.

"Wanda is probably the best director we could have because she can do everything," she said. "She is trained in ballet, tap, jazz, and she isn't specialized just in one area."

Driven by student participation, the KSRDC already has made several public appearances in its first year of existence, Mamura said. In the December WinterDance, the company performed a piece choreographed by guest artist Roni Mahler, who founded the K-State dance program.

The opportunity to work with guest artists is just one benefit the program has to offer its members, said Sarah Mermis, senior in dance and secondary education.

Mermis, who began dancing when she was 18, said dance is great exercise because of the athleticism and grace it requires. Being in the company also keeps her on her toes because it gives her the opportunity to try new things, she said.

"In dance, there is always a new challenge because there is no end to what you can accomplish," she said. "In the company I am constantly challenged. The idea is to practice so hard and so often that the actual performance is its own reward."

Since the company is repertory, the members retain each dance and continue to practice them as they learn new dances, Mamura said. This way, the members learn a number of dances in a variety of styles and continue to improve on the dances they already know, she said. Mamura said the company always is looking for opportunities to perform, and it also is an effective publicity tool for the dance department.

To promote interest in dance, the company plans to tour grade schools to perform for children and answer any questions they have about dance. The chance to spark interest in dance appealed to Thompson, who said the grade school performances were a motivating factor for her participation.

Working with a variety of choreographers, styles and other dancers is educational for the dancers, Thompson said. Thompson has been dancing since the age of three and doesn't plan to ever stop.

"Dancing is my passion. It keeps me sane," she said. "Just like some people have to write, and some have to run, well, I just have to dance."

The dance company will take an active role in the High School Day that the department has every year to give incoming dancers a preview of the dance department and the chance to compete for scholarships, Mamura said.

High School Day is when Ludes was first introduced to dance opportunities at K-State, she said. Ludes had to present a résumé with two letters of recommendation, go through an interview and participate in several classes. Ludes said she auditioned for the KSRDC because she always is looking for opportunities to perform, and the company is a way to broaden her horizons. Planning to continue with a career in dance after college, Ludes has been dancing since she was four, and she said dance is a major part of her life.

"Even days when we have long rehearsals, when I have been practicing all day, and I'm exhausted, and I just want to go to bed, it is still something I love," she said.

Since the age of four, Mamura has been training in dance which is why she felt burned out on dance when she came to K-State and didn't take any dance classes at first. It wasn't until dance was eliminated from her schedule that she said she realized how much she cared about it and truly appreciated the extensive training she had undergone. Now, the challenges that dancing continues to present keep her passionate about it, she said.

"Dance has a certain level of expressive freedom in it that lets you communicate through the dance," she said. "It challenges each dancer as a person and requires a certain amount of self-discipline, so it constantly makes you to grow as a person and gives you a greater appreciation for hard work."

Computer magnet erases final project

By LYNNE HERMANSEN
Kansas State Collegian

Imagine it is the last week of the semester, and after slaving away over a final project, all your hard work is wiped off your computer disk.

Last semester, Jim Cashatt, graduate student in horticultural therapy, lost his final project because of a magnet.

"It was coming down to the final wire, and I felt I deserved recognition for my work, so I took an incomplete for the course," Cashatt said.

Cashatt said the mishap was a setback for him, but he could redo the project.

"It was disastrous, but not the end of the world," he said. "I think, though, that something like this, getting too close to computer magnets, could be just as horrendous as bad spider bites."

Cashatt said Gary Cunningham, a computer technician in Throckmorton Hall, informed him that he lost his final project after getting too close to a magnet.

"I am not sure where the magnet was, but I do know that they are supposed to be shielded with plastic parts, so they won't cause this sort of problem," Cashatt said. "I guess there was a magnet not properly shielded."

Cunningham said computers store their information magnetically, but magnets are not found inside computers.

"I do not recall Cashatt's situation, but because floppy disks are magnetic medium, putting them near or in direct contact can wipe it clear," he said.

Cunningham said this occurs because of positive and negative magnetic directions inside the floppy disk.

"When a magnet comes in contact with a disk, it changes the directions to all the same direction, either all ones or zeros," he said.

"This is how the information stored on the disk disappears."

Cashatt said he still doesn't know how to prevent future problems and thinks information about computers and magnets should be given out to the campus.

"This is the first time I had heard about this, and I am sure many students are unaware of such an occurrence," he said.

Cunningham said knowing not to put magnets close to floppy disks is a basic understanding of computer knowledge.

"It is something people should know because floppy disks are a magnetic medium," he said.

Betsy Edwards, communications coordinator for Computing and Network Services, said she advises students keep their floppy disks clear of magnets.

"There is strong magnetic material in floppy disks," she said.

"Some phones also have magnets in them, so floppy disks should not be contacted with phones, either."

Cashatt said he would like to know how to prevent losing another final project.

"This same thing could happen to me again, even though the chance is supposed to be slim," he said.

"Once again, I think this is a very good topic for the school to address."

Women lead Senate, House

By JESSICA LEDUC
Kansas State Collegian

Today, more women are in leadership positions. The same is true for the Kansas Senate and House of Representatives.

Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, and Rep. Shari Weber, R-Herington, both have positions of high leadership in the Kansas Legislature — majority leaders.

Majority Leader Oleen said she started her 12-year career in politics by first volunteering her time.

"I volunteered in Riley County, helping deliver material for candidates," Oleen said. "I volunteered in the Republican Party and became the chair."

When a seat came open in the Senate, Oleen stepped forward.

"A vacancy came open in the Senate, and we were looking for someone, so I quit my job and ran," she said.

The job she eventually obtained was the majority leader for the Senate. The job includes being the chief spokesperson for their party, setting the calendar and keeping the legislative process running smoothly.

Oleen said her colleagues elected her to the position and knew she could handle the job.

"I offered up my services and my ability to tackle difficult issues," she said.

Since then, Oleen has served on several committees in the Senate. She has served on the Education and Judiciary committees and was chair of the Federal and State Affairs Committee.

Oleen said being a female in politics has not been an obstacle, but an opportunity to serve as a role model.

"Whether you are a male or female, you serve as a role model," Oleen said. "I have had several people tell me that they consider me as a role model."

Oleen said being an effective leader who works hard is more important than gender. "It's whether you're effective or not, not whether you're an effective male or female,"

Oleen said. "Down here, if you keep your word and work hard, people are going to like you whether you're a male or female."

Sen. Mark Taddiken, R-Clifton, said Oleen was chosen as the Senate majority leader because of her talent and experience.

"She's a very capable leader," Taddiken said. "She has demonstrated her ability to lead, and that's why she was elected to that position."

Another woman who also has an important leadership position in the Kansas government is Rep. Shari Weber.

WEBER

OLEEN

Weber has been a six-year member of the House of Representatives. She first was exposed to the Legislature by being involved in a community development program in Herington, Kan. Weber was the director of the Herington Main Street Program, which involved revitalizing the downtown area of the city with an emphasis on historic preservation.

"It takes a little bit of government money and pulls private expertise and private money," Weber said.

"I think that's the way more local and state governments should be run, as partnerships."

It was this thinking that led Weber into the House. She said that as she learned the process, she began to feel the need to serve in government.

"I wanted to give something back to this great country. The Legislature seemed like the best way to give something back," Weber said.

Once in the House, Weber served on several committees, including the House Appropriations and Public Safety Budget committees. Two years ago, Weber got experience in a leadership position when she served as the House assistant majority leader.

"That was another learning experience for me," Weber said. "Being in the Legislature is truly a lifelong learning process. It's amazing what things I learn each day."

Weber said she had not faced any obstacles getting where she is today because of her gender. She said that in some ways, being a female is an asset in the Legislature.

"There are males and females together working on things," Weber said. "It brings together different perspectives."

Weber compared being in government to the pioneers who first came to Kansas.

"Our pioneer spirit comes from sharing responsibilities," Weber said. "It's just the way Kansas is, males and females working together."

One colleague, Rep. Jeff Peterson, R-Manhattan, said Weber was chosen as House majority leader because of her experience.

"Shari is very knowledgeable and experienced," Peterson said. "I supported her knowing that she'd do a good job as majority leader."

Peterson said he had known Weber and was happy she was chosen for this position.

"I think she'll do an excellent job of getting people to work together," Peterson said. "It's a difficult job that I feel she's up to."

Weber said being a female in politics is no different than being a male. She said men in the House treat her as a colleague.

"Men and women work side by side as colleagues. They value my opinion, and I value theirs," Weber said. "They treat me as their colleague."

step up in energy conservation and go back to every college and department and make budget callbacks," Struve said.

"We are talking with the colleges and departments on callback figures so that the areas will know now," Struve said.

Callback transfers will occur in April, he said.

The last area where K-State is looking at a shortage is technology. Struve said the governor did not match funds with what students fund at K-State through credit-hour costs. For every credit hour that a student pays for, $1 is set aside for technology funding and in the past then has been matched by the state; however, this is not in the new proposed budget. As a result,

K-State came up short $1 million.

"We are very concerned and are working hard with the governor to discover ways to come up with the shortage," Clay Blair, chairperson and spokesperson for the regents, said. "Anytime you have a funding shortage, you have a problem."

"The regents are trying to make adjustments in the general budget for the shorted amount, and since it is realistically early in the legislative session, discussion is still ongoing."

Struve said that eligible faculty members will be looking at an approximate 6.2-percent pay increase thanks to Graves' budget.

A substantial faculty pay increase should make K-State competitive with other regent schools, Blair said.

Student Body President Jake Worcester said Student Senate is concerned about the proposal, and plans to take action.

"We are definitely concerned with the proposal as is, and will do everything we can to ask legislature to amend the budget. We want at least the base level of funding we had this year," he said.

Worcester and members of Student Senate will be visiting Topeka several times this semester to meet with legislative leaders and the Kansas Appropriations Committee to discuss higher-education issues, including the budget, Worcester said. They also will attend a State Education Day held at the Statehouse in the spring. All six regents schools are invited, and Worcester said he plans to bring around 20 to 30 K-State students. They will meet with every legislator and discuss higher education.

"Higher education is important and the question is, 'Can we find the money to make it happen?'" Worcester said.

4 Texas escapees captured in Colo., 1 commits suicide

By NICK WADHAMS
The Associated Press

WOODLAND PARK, Colo. — Acting on a tip, authorities on Monday captured four of the seven convicts who broke out of a Texas prison nearly six weeks ago and allegedly gunned down a policeman on Christmas Eve.

A fifth inmate killed himself inside a motor home that had been surrounded by authorities in this foothills community about 50 miles southwest of Denver.

The whereabouts of the two other inmates were unknown. Authorities said they may have been in Woodland Park as recently as Sunday and may have left to get more money.

"The story is by no means over," said Mark Mershon, the top FBI official in Colorado. "We have two suspects that are still on the loose."

Among those arrested was George Rivas, 30, the suspected ringleader who was serving a life sentence for aggravated robbery and kidnapping. Investigators have portrayed Rivas as fearless and shrewd with a powerful hold over the others.

The heavily armed inmates — including murderers, rapists and armed robbers — had puzzled and alarmed authorities by remaining together after bluffing their way out of prison Dec. 13. The savage slaying of the Dallas-area officer 11 days later only increased fears that the inmates might want to go out in a blaze of gunfire.

The convicts arrived in the sparsely populated area on Jan. 1, Teller County Sheriff Frank Fehn said. He offered no other details of their activities, nor how they covered the more than 800 miles from the prison in south Texas.

Authorities said a weekend tip prompted by the show "America's Most Wanted" led to the capture. The show had featured the convicts four times since the escape, including the last three Saturday nights.

Undersheriff Kevin Dougherty said authorities were told about the fugitives by the manager of the Coachlight, a combination motel and RV park where the motor home was located. The park, tucked away amid pine trees, was put under surveillance at 2 a.m. Monday, authorities said.

Rivas and two others were arrested as they pulled up for gasoline at a convenience store near Woodland Park, Dougherty said. There were weapons in the Jeep, he said, refusing to be more specific.

State Patrol Trooper Eric Zachareas, who was at the convenience store, said the captured convicts have told authorities the missing fugitives are apparently seeking more money. He said he didn't know whether that meant they planned a robbery.

The Texas Department of Criminal Justice said Rivas was captured with inmates Michael Rodriguez and Joseph Garcia. Authorities said inmate Larry Harper killed himself inside the motor home sometime after another convict, Randy Halprin, walked outside.

Harper had wanted to speak to his father, and authorities arranged for him to do so by cellphone, Fehn said. He was dead from a gunshot wound to the chest by the time the arrangements were made.

Still missing were Patrick Murphy Jr., convicted of rape, and Donald Newbury, imprisoned for armed robbery.

Fehn said authorities had "no idea" where the pair might be.

As a precaution, officials in Colorado Springs and Manitou Springs, both within 20 miles of Woodland Park, locked down several schools.

"It's very scary," said Kristie Allen, 27, a hairstylist at Hair Studio

West in Woodland Park, who listened to news of the captures on a radio at the shop. "No one wants to go outside."

The seven inmates followed a cunning plan to overpower 13 prison employees during their escape from the maximum-security Connally Unit in Kenedy, southeast of San Antonio. They stole a cache of weapons and drove away unchallenged in a prison pickup.

According to authorities, the inmates robbed an Irving sporting goods store and gunned down Officer Aubrey Hawkins when he showed up. He was shot 11 times, and his body was run over by a vehicle. The thieves fled with guns, clothing and $70,000 in cash and checks.

A $500,000 reward was offered for information leading to the arrest and conviction of Hawkins' killer. After the captures, his mother, Jayne Hawkins, said: "I want them to see me ... They will look at me, and I want to see what they look like when they look at the mother of a child who is gone."

The escape was the largest from a Texas state prison in modern history. Before last month, Texas had recaptured all but one of the 143 inmates who escaped from its state prisons in the past 10 years. A scathing state review blamed prison employees for the escape; a warden has since been demoted and other employees disciplined.

The parents of Halprin, the youngest escapee at 23, were grateful when they learned of his capture, said Bill Waybourn, a family friend and chief of police in the Houston suburb where Halprin grew up.

"They're obviously so relieved that no other police officers or innocent people were hurt, and extremely relieved that this thing looks like it's going to wind down fairly peaceful — answered prayers, to be exact," he said.

Even though the time commitment with architecture can be demanding, Neff said he still is happy with his future career choice.

"Even though I may not get a lot of sleep, and sometimes I'm stressed, I still enjoy this, and I feel I'm getting something out of my education," Neff said. "I don't see myself doing anything else."

Architecture students have a unique closeness that other areas of study may not offer, Nate Adolf, a first-year architecture student, said.

"All of us know each other well, and we are all friends," Adolf said. "There is a bond we get from being in studio for many hours that makes us learn and depend on each other."

Adolf said he is prepared to spend the next few years of his college career within the walls of Seaton Hall.

"Architecture is a lot more time consuming than I thought it would be, but I'm getting used to it," he said.

Elena Vossman, a third-year landscape architecture student, said studying late at night doesn't bug her, but it does bother her mother.

"My mom worries about me walking alone to my car late at night," Vossman said. "We all try to leave at the same time when possible just to be safe."

When she is not at studio, Vossman said it is hard to enjoy her free time because she is constantly thinking about things she needs to complete.

"I feel worthless when I'm not at studio or if I don't have anything to work on because I'm so used to working on projects all of the time," Vossman said. "When I'm not here I'm always thinking of what I'd be doing if I was here."

Time management and discipline is the key to staying organized for many architecture students, according to John Olson, a third-year landscape architecture student.

"I've seen some people drop out of architecture because they don't like all of the time that is required," said Olson, who has seen the sun rise many times while studying in Seaton Hall. "If you manage your time right you don't miss much."

Many architecture students listen to music or browse the Internet to help ease the strain and stress of long hours of studying through the night. The atmosphere in the studio rooms is very relaxed and easy to work in, Olson said.

Even though most architecture students may not get to enjoy a big college social life, many believe it will pay off in the end, he said.

"In high school I always thought I'd party every night when I got to college," Olson said. "I never imagined I'd spend my nights doing this. It's bizarre."

percent," he said.

much higher or lower the number is than 65 degrees and figures into the department's heating degree days. Rice said in November of 1999 the heating degree days were at 405 and in the year 2000 were 856, and he had not yet received the December bill.

waiting on a CALL

Students volunteer as campus safety escorts at night

By APRIL MIDDLETON
Kansas State Collegian

They sat for two hours Monday night waiting for the phone to ring. They aren't waiting for anyone particular to call, nor do they mind if the phone never rings. Sometimes it doesn't.

Whether a call comes or not, Ryan Heusinkveld, sophomore in architecture, and Kendell Powell, junior in life sciences, are on hand to escort students, faculty, staff and people in the community to their destinations after dark.

Heusinkveld volunteers six hours each week to the organization.

"My first intent in volunteering was to make the campus safer," Heusinkveld said.

He said he has volunteered for two years. Campus safety is one reason he still volunteers, but more important is that he can help students feel comfortable and safe being on campus at night.

"It makes me feel like I'm doing my part for the campus," Heusinkveld said. "I may be helping keep someone safe just by walking with them. I'll never know if anything would have happened if they were alone, but there's no nicer feeling than knowing I've helped someone out."

Heusinkveld and Powell are two of about 20 volunteers for Wildcat Walk.

Volunteers are required to go through an informal interview, a background check with the police department and an in-depth training. Volunteers are then paired with each other for weekly shifts.

Volunteers are asked to work one two-hour shift each week. Wildcat Walk's functioning hours are from 6 p.m. to 2 a.m. Volunteers are available during these hours. When volunteers are not on duty, K-State Police respond to all requests for escorts.

Craig Doty, senior in social science and Wildcat Walk coordinator, said volunteers aren't assigned duties other than being available for escorts when requested.

"They can do whatever they want as long as they are here, prepared and listen for the phone," Doty said.

Doty said this type of freedom makes it easier for volunteers to help others and still take care of their own business. Volunteers are stationed in the 24-hour study room in the library. They have access to computers and the Internet.

During this time they can work on homework or anything else, as long as they are available to take calls. Heusinkveld and Powell share stories of what has happened since they saw each other last or do homework.

"It's really kind of a variable," Doty said. "Sometimes they get several calls and other times there aren't any. It's unpredictable."

Powell doesn't mind the unpredictability. She said she has volunteered

Primary election scheduled

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
Kansas State Collegian

With two last-minute candidates filing, the city will have two elections instead of just one for seats on the Manhattan City Commission.

Less than 30 minutes before Tuesday's noon deadline to file, two more citizens filed to run, bringing the total to seven candidates for the three open seats. As per election rules, more than six candidates requires a primary election to eliminate any extra candidates, followed by a general election for the remaining six.

Art Burgess, vice president of Kansas Electrical Supply Company Inc., was the citizen that tipped the scales, recorded as filing at 11:55 a.m. that day.

"I've been planning on it for over a year," he said.

Burgess said he decided to wait until 11:30 a.m. and see who else filed. In addition to frustration with issues like the proposed redevelopment of the Third Street area, Burgess said, he was concerned that three candidates are incumbents. Commissioners Roger Reitz and Karen McCulloh were each elected to four-year terms in 1997. Commissioner Carol Peak was elected to a two-year term in 1999.

David Johnson, a self-employed consultant adviser and the sixth candidate to file, passed Burgess on his way out of the building Tuesday. Johnson said he was running for similar reasons.

University not involved in shooting

By JENNIFER O'NEILL

K-State officials said Tuesday that the university was in no way involved in Sunday's shooting that injured a K-State student and killed a Fort Riley soldier.

"I think it's sad that it happened and it will affect the student who was shot in her ability to continue her education," Carla Jones, associate dean of student life, said. "We're reaching out to her and to her family."

Isabel Amaya, 19, sophomore in microbiology, was shot in the left arm as she stood outside of the Fraternal Order of the Eagles club at 312 S. Fourth St. at about 2 a.m. She was taken to Mercy Health Center on College Ave., where, according to Mercy's nursing supervisor, she is resting in stable condition.

International student enrollment above national average at K-State

By SHANNON BURKDOLL
Kansas State Collegian

International student enrollment has increased 8.4 percent this fall, totaling 1,016 students from 101 countries.

The recent increase in international enrollment, which is above the national increase, brought 79 more international students to K-State.

Special agreements with Paraguay and Costa Rica, reciprocal exchanges and economical advancements have contributed to the recruitment of the international students.

The Office of International Programs is working to rebuild the number of international students at K-State.

International student numbers dropped to less than 30 percent from 1993 to 1997.

This was due to a lack of active recruitment and there wasn't a fully equipped International Student Center then, said William Richter, associate provost for international programs.

The Office of International Programs received $250,000 to expand the International Student Center and added the Taiwan wing to give the center more capabilities and a more proactive stance, Richter said.

"Mid-America appeals to students and particularly families because it is perceived as a safe place with better core values than elsewhere in the country," Richter said.

China, India and Korea were the top sending countries. They sent a total of 480 students and contributed to almost half the international student population. Graduates in these strong educational countries see studying in the United States as an opportunity to pursue an advanced degree at a research-driven university, Richter said.

The international student population is predominantly graduate students, Richter said.

K-State has made an effort to recruit more students, especially at the undergraduate level, Richter said. Half of the undergraduate international student population is made up of short-term exchange students, he said.

International Programs is attempting to make international exchange more feasible to all students by giving scholarships and making travel easier. The study abroad club meets with the international students upon their arrival in Manhattan to serve as mentors.

Amanda Finger, study abroad club member and senior in political science, said Manhattan is not very internationally oriented.

"International students are completely the minority," Finger said.

K-State tends to be less internationalized than any other Big 12 school, Crissan Zeigler, international education advisor, said.

"The biggest problem is Housing and Dining Services have just made a new decision that international students will not have temporary housing upon their arrival, unless they sign a contract to live in the dorms for the year," Zeigler said. "In order to internationalize the campus, we have to create an infrastructure that is welcoming, so international students can have an enjoyable time and act as K-State recruiters when they return to their homes."

Patricia Kuhn, an international student from Brazil and junior in biology, visited Kansas in high school and returned to attend K-State.

"I came back because I really liked the people in Kansas," Kuhn said. "I find it better to study here than at home because the system of education is different."

More international students are becoming aware of the programs here, Kuhn said.

"It gives you a totally different view of life, a total different perspective," she said. "Just because it is different, it doesn't have to be bad."

Farmers, elevators to be paid back for corn recall

DES MOINES, Iowa — The creator of a genetically modified corn that ended up in the food supply and prompted the recall of taco shells and other products has agreed to pay millions in compensation to farmers and grain elevators across the country.

Estimates of the cost to Aventis CropScience range from $100 million to $1 billion.

"We're talking about massive amounts of grain," Iowa Attorney General Tom Miller said Tuesday. "This is a significant agreement."

Miller said the four-year agreement between Aventis and 17 states, mainly in the Midwest, calls for the company to pay farmers up to 25 cents per bushel for tainted corn, and reimburse them for other losses. The total amount of grain has not been determined.

In a statement, the company said it is pleased with the agreement. The deal does not prevent farmers or other individuals from suing the company.

Geologists work to vent Hutchinson gas bubble

HUTCHINSON, Kan. — With gas geysers diminishing, geologists focused their attention Tuesday on finding ways to vent the natural gas bubble still trapped deep beneath this central Kansas city.

"The recovery is all doable," said Joe Ratigan, a geological engineer for Sofergaz U.S. Inc. of Rapid City, S.D.

He told city council members Tuesday morning that geologists still do not know the volume of gas below the city, or its pressure level. Until they do, he said, they won't know how long it will take to vent it.

"We have to get a good handle on how effective venting is to assess how much gas is down there," he said.

Work continued on two vent wells that geologists hope will hit one of the so-called gas transmission zones — porous formations where gas naturally accumulates.

The first well is not expected to be completed until Thursday or Friday, and it won't be known until then whether there is a gas pocket in the area where the well is being drilled.

Geologists are also considering whether to unclog some deep wells to save time and speed the venting, Ratigan said.

Mayor Patrick McCreary said gas geysers around town have been diminishing even further since the leak in a salt storage cavern northwest of the city was plugged Sunday. Hutchinson has a lot of deep old wells that were not properly plugged that could serve as gas conduits.

Geologists are also monitoring old sinkholes — formed with the collapse of salt mining caverns from the late 1800s and early 1900s — that could also provide paths for gas to reach the surface.

The state agency plans to drill six to eight observation wells in an effort to track the flow of gas.

Galapagos diesel slicks begin to move out to sea

PUERTO BAQUERIZO, Galapagos Islands — Shifting winds and prevailing tides are pushing about 170,000 gallons of diesel fuel from a stricken tanker toward open sea and away from the fragile environment of the Galapagos Islands, officials said Tuesday.

Van of 2 remaining Texas prison escapees found Tuesday in Colorado

By NICK WADHAMS
The Associated Press

WOODLAND PARK, Colo. — A van used by two Texas prison escapees to flee this mountain town was found Tuesday at a motel about 20 miles from where four fellow fugitives were captured and a fifth committed suicide.

Police surrounded the four-story Quality Inn in Colorado Springs, but there was no sign of the two inmates, police spokesman Skip Arms said.

"This is, in fact, the van we've been looking for," Arms said as he stood in the parking lot. "We're checking in local hotels attempting to locate the two fugitives."

He also said the two convicts could have stolen another vehicle and left the area.

Also Tuesday, a state trooper was killed while pursuing what turned out to be an inaccurate tip about the van. Authorities said the trooper lost control of his car and slammed into a parked truck on Interstate 70. The van he was following later turned up at the Keystone ski resort full of construction workers.

The developments came as state and federal officers followed hundreds of leads for the two fugitives, a day after authorities raided a trailer park and captured four others and found an arsenal of loaded guns and thousands of rounds of ammunition. A seventh fugitive committed suicide.

Wilma David, who works in a restaurant near the motel, told KMGH-TV she and her co-workers spotted the van in the parking lot. They peeked inside and saw duffel bags, maps and hair dye. The restaurant manager called police.

"I thought to myself, that looks like the one they've been describing on television," she said. "We looked at it and the color was right."

Arms said the van could have been in the lot since Monday night but officers believe it arrived early Tuesday.

The seven broke out of the Connally Unit in Kenedy, south-east of San Antonio, on Dec. 13. They overpowered civilian workers and a guard and stole a cache of weapons. They are also suspected in the Dec. 24 sporting goods store robbery in Irving, Texas, that left a police officer, Aubrey Hawkins, dead. More guns were stolen in the holdup.

Monday's captures and suicide took place in Woodland Park, a foothills community about 50 miles southwest of Denver. Inside the motor home, officers found a suicide note, $10,000 in cash and about 35 firearms, including 13 of the 14 weapons missing from the Texas prison, authorities said.

The firearms were "loaded, cocked and ready for action, as we say," said Mark Mershon, the top FBI agent in Denver. Thousands of rounds of ammunition, wireless communications devices and receipts for bulletproof vests purchased in Denver and Aurora also were found, he said.

Before the discovery of the van, authorities had said they had no definite word on the location of the missing inmates, Patrick Murphy Jr., 39, convicted of rape, and armed robber Donald Newbury, 38.

They may have been in Woodland Park as recently as Sunday and may have left to get more money.

The four in custody were expected to appear Tuesday before a federal magistrate in nearby Divide.

The breakthrough that sent authorities to the Coachlight motel and RV park in Woodland Park came from tips from residents after the TV show "America's Most Wanted" aired Saturday.

Authorities believe all seven escaped convicts had been living in the motor home for up to three weeks.

Students travel to Costa Rica

By KRISTEN DYMAK
Kansas State Collegian

A chance to see banana plantations, botanical gardens and rain forests was enough to convince nine K-State students to travel to Costa Rica during winter break.

The group, made up of mostly horticulture students, spent Dec. 15-22 visiting various plantations and gardens as well as other cultural attractions in San Jose and surrounding towns.

"It was really a mind-expanding trip," Adam Springer, senior in horticulture, said.

The trip was part of a horticulture study and was organized by horticulture professor Houchang Khatamian.

"I had been to Costa Rica two years ago and fell in love with the lush horticulture," Khatamian said. "There is such a diversity of horticultural there, and I said, 'Boy, I'm going to bring a class here.'"

Khatamian, who also organized a horticulture trip to the Netherlands a few years ago, said trips like these were important for college students to experience.

"I realized we needed to expose our students to these different horticulture experiences," he said.

"Different parts of the world offer different richnesses. We have to get these students to go far away and see what's going on in other parts of the world."

Julie Rayburn, senior in horticulture, said the group visited a variety of horticulture attractions not found in the United States, including where seeds are propagated and where bananas, coffee and other crops are cultivated and grown.

"We saw stuff most people couldn't just walk off the street and see," Rayburn said. "We learned a lot about the different crops and how they grow."

Springer said the group didn't just focus on the horticultural aspects of Costa Rica.

"To see the culture itself was a big objective of mine," he said. "We did see a lot of the cultural aspects of Costa Rica."

The students were also able to visit a rain forest and spend some time on a beach as well as hear salsa and mariachi bands.

Rayburn said one of her favorite parts of the trip was visiting the naturally heated springs at the Tabaccon Resort and Spa.

"The resort and spa was on the side of a mountain," she said. "It was just absolutely gorgeous."

Springer said he appreciated seeing as many attractions as he did.

"No way could you ever go to Costa Rica and see everything in that short amount of time like we did,"

he said. "I would recommend that every student participates in one of these trips."

Khatamian said the trip was successful and everyone seemed to learn a lot from it.

"They all fell in love with Costa Rica," he said, "just like I did."

Residents must stay informed on local elections

Political focus has been primarily on the national candidates for a considerable amount of time. Now it's time to start focusing on the upcoming city elections.

The primary for the city elections will be Feb. 27. The general election will take place April 5.

Students, faculty, staff and the community as a whole need to become informed on the various platforms that local candidates are taking stances on.

No one should use the excuse "Well, I don't know the candidates."

It is easier for most individuals to follow the elections in the Little Apple than it is for them to try to keep connections with politicians from their hometown.

Running for city commission are the following: Art Burgess, Mark Taussig, Karen McCulloh, David Johnson, Brad Everett, Carol Peak and Roger Reitz.

For Ogden council, the following are candidates: David Ward, Lewis Shepard, Katrina Brooks, Wayne Henson, Mardee Hutchinson and Ward Nations. Running for Mayor of Ogden is John Kizze.

Remember to register and keep informed. Those in local power often have more of an influence on your lives than you might realize.

The only reason I flunked out of college last semester was because of that damn beer.

What good is it to pay privilege fees when the Rec is too crowded to use?

As if $15,000 isn't enough in tuition at Kansas State, they need another 15 bucks for me to graduate.

Good gosh, if you can't do your own taxes, you're pathetic.

Thank you, Justin Hayworth. What a great picture in the Sports section.

To the Collegian sports staff, Rick's college is in Idaho, not Utah.

If you're so dumb that you can't enroll without an adviser, or can't do your taxes without an accountant, you don't belong in college. Go back home to mommy and daddy where you won't be held responsible.

How in the world can Ted Kennedy or Jesse Jackson question anyone's integrity? Especially John Ashcroft's.

I'm with the loser engineer — bring Dilbert back.

If you think Throckmorton's a sauna, try having a class in Seaton.

Having a president babble during his inauguration speech sure is a heck of a lot better than having a president lie to you for four years, or eight for that matter.

Question for Thursday: What about the Bush administration are you looking forward to?

'I'm looking for something in ROYAL BLUE'

Opposite sex needs representation in lingerie franchise

Dear Victoria,

Though you reign as queen of women's lingerie in today's sexy society, I feel there are a few things that should be brought to your attention. I am writing you today to give both the lowdown on your stores and my personal experiences with your Secret.

First of all, I'd just like to congratulate you on a top-notch Web site. While browsing for the writing of this letter, I was chastised by fellow Collegian staff members. All mistakenly accused me of viewing pornography, when really I was checking out the "Top 10 Bras."

Your site was easily navigable, offered a detailed description and picture of nearly all of your products and included a page on the correct way to measure bust size. Educational lingerie sizing — I love it!

Now down to business. I really hadn't ventured into any of your stores before the 2000 Christmas season. Sure, there were those junior high dares I accepted. Did you see me dashing through as a 13-year-old back in 1993 just to touch the back wall, tip over a bin or two, race back out and make a quick buck? Rest assured, I have matured.

I now enjoy strolling at a leisurely pace into your stores, mesmerized by the glittering gold lettering above the door and teased by seductive posters.

I am tortured by the eyes of women shoppers threatened by my manly presence.

Back in December, when I entered your local branch at Manhattan Town Center, the scene was set. Slightly intimidated, I strolled in with two friends, finding my strength in numbers.

I knew what I wanted long before I ever entered the store. Something very simple. Something easy. Something I just knew you would have in stock. All I desired was something in royal blue. That's right, I cared for no specific design or collection. I just wanted something in a deep blue for that special-awesome-radical-absolutely-hip girl.

Ouch! Your saleswoman slapped me across the face (not literally) with a torrent of words, proceeding to inform me that royal blue was NOT the "in" style color, so there would be no pieces in stock.

However, she informed me, light pink and lavender were the "in" colors and would I just step right over here? Continuing to verbally deluge me, she told me every minute detail about all 24,000 scraps of lacy material in the place.

She did not, however, help me find anything in royal blue. I left that day empty handed, but my mind was full of new information.

Last week when I was walking past Haymaker to get to class, a sign on one of the windows caught my attention. The sign was meant to be attention-getting. On a piece of neon-green poster board was a crudely written message.

The sign said, "Free breast exams," followed by a room number.

I will admit I laughed when I saw the sign the first time, but then I started thinking about what the sign really meant. It was obviously a sophomoric attempt at humor made by an immature person. I tried to shove it to the far recesses of my mind by saying boys will be boys and it's just another example of bad taste and thoughtlessness. As hard as I tried to focus on something else, my mind kept going back to the sign.

At first I wondered why the perpetrators would put up such a demeaning sign. What were they thinking? Obviously they weren't trying to attract women. What self-respecting woman would want to be associated with someone who was trying to objectify women as an object for his

AUSTIN PORTER/Collegian

SEMI-ANNUAL SALE

I returned this January for your semi-annual sale. The extremely small pieces of sheer cloth, which you sell for more than I make writing columns all semester, were drastically reduced. I also returned with my prior knowledge. I thought that there would be no royal blue panties, but I found some in the bin for $6.99.

In the bra bins, I wasn't so lucky. But I found a nice purplish-colored one that I found affection for and I had to take it home. I left your store with an unmatched set of bra and panties (OK, Sarah, they're underwear). My bill was under $20, but still pretty steep for two articles. Both would need to be hand washed. Most people won't even see either one. I hoped to, someday.

SUGGESTIONS

I leave you now with my suggestions for your stores.

1. Males should work in Victoria's Secret because women always sell guys' underwear. Simple logic. You know how there are always women where we buy our boxers and tighty-whities? There ought to be a few of us hawking the nylon-rayon-see-through get ups that make our dreams.

2. Guys feel more comfortable talking to another guy when buying their lady something. It's tribal. Like when I walked into your store, I was intimidated. If there was a male to greet me (and he wouldn't have to be homosexual to work there), I'd be more apt to purchase.

3. Guys need somebody to B.S. with while they shop. Usually not a female. As a male, I can't say to one of your saleswomen, "Is this lacy outfit ssssexy?" Lest she think I was making the move on her or something. I could however, say to a salesman, "Dude, would this look really ssssexy on my girlfriend?" And he would chuckle and say, "Yeah, man. Definitely." He'd make the sale. And your profits would go up.

4. Male salespeople could ask more intelligent questions that the women miss. "Do you want it to unhook in the front or the back?" Vital if the male shopper hopes to remove the garment in the future. "Do you want to be able to see through it?" Again, shopper's preference is crucial later. And if the shopper didn't know what size he needed, the male salesperson would just hold up two fists and say, "Bigger than these or smaller than these?" In a short period, the size would be pinpointed. Alas, I must be going now.

If you implement my plan and profits skyrocket. I wish you would stock me some royal blue next Christmas. But if you don't I won't be mad and irrational, just disappointed.

Don't worry, Victoria, like Willie the Wildcat's identity, your Secret is safe with me.

Be careful not to mistake thoughtlessness for humor

Last week when I was walking past Haymaker to get to class, a sign on one of the windows caught my attention. The sign was meant to be attention-getting. On a piece of neon-green poster board was a crudely written message.

The sign said, "Free breast exams," followed by a room number.

I will admit I laughed when I saw the sign the first time, but then I started thinking about what the sign really meant. It was obviously a sophomoric attempt at humor made by an immature person. I tried to shove it to the far recesses of my mind by saying boys will be boys and it's just another example of bad taste and thoughtlessness. As hard as I tried to focus on something else, my mind kept going back to the sign.

At first I wondered why the perpetrators would put up such a demeaning sign. What were they thinking? Obviously they weren't trying to attract women. What self-respecting woman would want to be associated with someone who was trying to objectify women as an object for his pleasure rather than a real person with feelings?

Then I began to wonder if the person who made the sign even knew what a breast exam was. The purpose of a breast exam is to detect cancer. Contrary to what the sign's creator may think, breast exams are not funny. If I had to associate any emotion with a breast exam it certainly wouldn't be humor. The adjectives that come to mind are anxiety, trepidation and fear.

My mind didn't stop there. A sick feeling came over me with my next revelation. I wondered what effect the sign would have on someone who had cancer or who had been through a mastectomy. I'm sure they wouldn't find the sign humorous at all. They would probably be very upset with such an inconsiderate action.

To squelch these thoughts, I decided to go talk to the person who had the sign in his window. My friend and I made a trip over to Haymaker and we caught the young man as he was walking in his front apologized and said he was just trying to make a joke.

That remark got to me. Quite often we say or do things we think are funny without thinking about the ramifications our words and actions have on others.

If the young man who made the sign would have thought about the effect his action was going to have on others I would like to think he would have never made the sign in the first place. Is that a sign he would be proud to show to his mother? Is that the sort of sign he wants his girlfriend or sister to have to see?

When I left home to come back to school last semester, my dad gave me three little words of advice. This was his advice. "Watch your mouth."

The words are simple, but their meaning carries much complexity. These three words remind me to think before I speak. They remind me to stop and take a moment to think before I act or speak out in the heat of the moment.

That's a lot harder in practice than in theory. Too often we spit out biting and caustic remarks that hurt others just to make us look good. Or we demean others through crude actions meant to make us look funny or smooth.

If we think about the effect our actions and words had on others we might be able to save ourselves from looking like jerks when thoughtless comments come bubbling to the surface. We might keep someone from feeling worthless. We might be proud of ourselves for being the bigger person. We might not be reading another column like this in the future.

Graduate student runs to raise funds for leukemia society

By ERIN DENN
Kansas State Collegian

Serina McEntire, graduate student in kinesiology, understands going the distance for the sake of others. Last year, she completed the Rock 'n' Roll Marathon in San Diego, a feat that was determined by an 8-year-old girl in remission from a blood-related cancer.

"I ran in honor of Chelsea," McEntire said. "I knew what we were doing was for a cause."

McEntire was among thousands of others who have committed hours of fund raising and training to support the Leukemia and Lymphoma Society, a non-profit organization. This year she is staying involved with the cause by being the assistant coach for the Manhattan area.

According to the society's Web site, www.leukemia-lymphoma.org, leukemia, lymphoma and Hodgkin's disease are cancers of the body's blood forming and immune systems: the bone marrow and lymph nodes. They are considered to be related to cancers because they involve the uncontrolled growth of cells with similar functions.

Today in the U.S., there are an estimated 142,000 leukemia patients.

The incidence rates for lymphoma have nearly doubled since the 1970s. Hodgkin's disease and myeloma also fall under this category.

Team in Training is the program that uses events such as marathons, triathlons and century bike rides to raise money for advocacy, patient aid programs and education. A person signs up to participate in an event.

Depending on the event, that person is required to raise a certain amount of money for the society. In return, the society provides accommodations to and during the event.

"The majority of your money is going to fight cancer," McEntire said.

McEntire first became interested when a friend from her hometown completed a marathon for the society.

"I was always like, runners are crazy," she said.

McEntire said the farthest she had ever run before was two miles, but after hearing the story of her friend, who lost a substantial amount of weight and then completed the 26.2-mile run, she began thinking she could do it after all.

The first step McEntire took was to attend a meeting. People who had experienced the marathons spoke about the pros and cons. Information was handed out and potential participants had the opportunity to take the packet home and think about it before committing.

The society provides a training program and other training information, from shoe lacing patterns to preventing injuries, throughout the four to five months of training. Each person is paired with an honor patient, someone who is battling one of the diseases or is in remission. That person is the runner's inspiration.

"She would call me everyday and ask, 'Did you run today?'" McEntire said of Chelsea. "You cannot let down an 8-year-old."

The amount of money a runner is required to raise by fund raising varies between $1,500 and $6,000. McEntire's fund-raising goal was $3,000.

"The first $2,000 came really easy. The last $700 was difficult," McEntire said.

She organized bake sales, garage sales, raffles and a letter writing campaign to raise the money. She even went on the radio to promote her cause.

"The marathon—actually running it—was a lot easier than raising the money," she added.

McEntire said the society raised $6 billion last year alone. About 6,000 people, including McEntire, ran for the society in San Diego. They raised around $6 million. More than 13,000 other runners participated in the marathon.

"If you think of how far that goes—it's only giving up four to five months of your life," McEntire said.

"It's something you can be very proud of."

McEntire said there is a training regimen for beginners, intermediate and advance runners.

"It varies so you aren't worn out all the time," she said. "And everybody is so accessible. That's one of the nice things about the society."

"They make it a lot easier so everybody could reach their goal. Approximately 90 percent of the people reach their goal."

McEntire said there is support throughout the marathon. Everyone who runs for the society wears the same shirt with their name on the back so people can yell words of encouragement directed to a specific person. Coaches stay on the sidelines to keep up the morale.

"It picks you up," McEntire said. "It gives you a little more sprint in your step."

The types of participants vary, McEntire said.

"We saw people who were 80-90 years old running it. Kids were running with their parents," she said. "There are a lot of walkers who do it."

Kelly Gerstenkorn, campaign manager for the Society, said this is the 13th year nationwide for the Team in Training program and the ninth year in Kansas.

"There are a lot of people in Kansas and families who are devastated by these diseases," Gerstenkorn said. "It's a great program."

The program is available throughout the year. Marathons are located all over the country myself I couldn't do.

Union art gallery undergoes renovations to stay trendy

By CAMILLE BOISSEAU
Kansas State Collegian

A light new look can be found in the Union art gallery this semester. Renovations during winter break transformed the art gallery to stay current with today's trends.

The improvements include new double track lighting, about 10 more feet of exhibit space, a new ceiling treatment and cable that allows the museum to show art over the Internet.

The renovation ideas were developed with the help of Lorie Bender, director of the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art.

"Our goal was to create a space to best exhibit art, to minimize space and have the proper lighting," Bender said.

None of these improvements could have been possible without the $100,000 donation from the William T. Kemper Foundation, a Commerce Bank trustee. The foundation wanted to support the Union and assist with the renovations.

The William T. Kemper Foundation was established in 1989 following Kemper's death. The foundation gives to the arts and many charitable foundations. This is the first time any donation has been given to help renovations at the Union.

"Commerce Bank understands the importance of the K-State Student Union and its programs in the life of K-State students," Ted Haggart, Commerce Bank president, said.

Bernard Pitts, executive director of the K-State Student Union, said the art gallery is an excellent environment for people to display their art. Having a good facility for people to display their work allows the art to have its full impact, he said.

The Union plans on making changes every semester if funds allow for the plans.

"This is a way for the Union to make an effort to stay current with the changes in the times, trends and the students," Pitts said.

2nd K-State volleyball player included on All-American list

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

In 1999, Dawn Cady became the first K-State volleyball player in the team's 25-year history to be named an All-American.

Now, just one year later, the Cats have their second player named to the list.

Junior outside hitter Liz Wegner has been named one of seven honorable mention All-Americans by Volleyball Magazine. Designed as an individual award, Wegner said she really views it as honoring the entire K-State volleyball program.

"It's a great honor, but it really just shows where K-State volleyball has gone the last couple of years," Wegner said. "It says a lot of the program."

Still, the honor was just one of many received by the Grand Island, Neb., native this season. She also was selected to the first team All-Big 12, the All-Central Regional team and the Midwest Regional team. Wegner also was on the Academic All-Big 12 second team.

During the 2000 season, in which the Cats advanced to the Sweet 16 of the NCAA tournament for the first time in school history, Wegner recorded 571 kills, second most in the conference and second most in K-State history, behind Dawn Cady. She broke the school and Big 12 record for kills in a three-game match with 34 against Colorado on Oct. 11, 2000. Entering the 2001 season, Wegner needs just 180 kills to break the K-State season record of 1,646, maintained by Kim Zschau.

The statistics point to Wegner's talent, but what they do not indicate is her work ethic, drive and fierce competitive attitude.

"Liz loves to be in the gym. She likes to work hard. She likes to compete," head coach Jim McLaughlin said. "She likes working hard, she likes lifting weights, she likes running. She likes the things you need to like to excel, to distinguish yourself, and she's done those things."

"There were times that she was hurt and didn't feel good, and she went out and gave it everything she had. I think she's a pretty tough person. When I've presented her with a challenge, she likes to meet the challenge. She's a competitive person."

Ironically, as well as Wegner has performed for K-State, she received few recruiting visits as a senior in high school.

"A lot of the bigger Division I schools thought of me as being too small," Wegner said. "A lot of people told me I wouldn't play Division I, but I wasn't really going to listen to that. I'm just lucky K-State came along."

Indeed, McLaughlin was interested, especially when he realized how badly Wegner wanted to be a Wildcat.

"She had significant power. She could hit the ball hard. She had pretty good speed, and she loved to compete. But also, on top of that, she really wanted to come to K-State,"

McLaughlin said. "We wanted her, and earlier in that year, we didn't have a scholarship, and she was willing to walk on, and that just told me she really wants to be here."

Even though Wegner has worked her way up to All-America status, McLaughlin said he still expects more from her.

"The better you get, the tougher it is to improve, but the great players find a way. I want Liz to be a great one," he said. "I want Liz to be better her senior year than she was her junior year. I want her better than she was this year, and I know she can do that."

SPORTS BRIEFS

Laurie Koehn out for season

Women's basketball freshman guard Laurie Koehn, who was voted the Preseason Big 12 Freshman of the Year, will not play this year, head coach Deb Patterson said. Koehn injured her foot in preseason workouts and has not played in a single game.

K-State will petition the NCAA for a medical redshirt for Koehn, but won't know the results until March or April.

K-State ranked 12th in Sears Directors' Cup fall standings

K-State is ranked 12th in the final Division I fall standings for the Sears Directors' Cup, presented annually by the nation's athletic directors.

Points are awarded based on each university's finish in up to 20 sports. The Cats finished with 168 points, receiving 62 points for football's eighth-place ranking, 56 points for cross country's 10th place finish and 50 points for reaching the Sweet 16 in volleyball.

North Carolina finished first with 310 points, led by its national championship in women's soccer. Other Big 12 schools that placed in the top 50 were Nebraska (5th), Colorado (6th), Texas A&M (T29th), Oklahoma (T34th) and Missouri (T44th).

Last year, K-State finished 67th.

Crew teams to raise money for Habitat for Humanity group

K-State's women's crew and men's crew club are raising money for themselves and Habitat for Humanity.

Athletes have been collecting donations and pledges. Today, for the second day, they each row for an hour on machines in the Union Courtyard. The pledges are based on every hundred meters each athlete rows in that time period, about 15,000 meters for the men and 13,000 meters for the women, said Al Koch, rowing club administrator and manager.

"They row for an hour and see how far they can go, and they try and get pledges for so much per hundred meters. It might be a dime per hundred meters, a quarter per hundred meters," Koch said. "We try and have everybody earn a minimum of a $100 in pledges or donations. We've had some people that get over $600."

In addition to the K-State team working out on the rowing machines, any student is welcome to try.

"We get a lot of people coming up asking about the club and what we're doing. I think we've had, like, three or four people just walk down the stairs and do it for a while," Koch said. "A couple years ago, the guy that's our current club president was just rowing for the Habitat for Humanity organization, and he decided to become a rower and became one of our better rowers. He did the full hour the first time, and he was competitive with some of the men who were doing it."

Most students, though, can't even begin to make a dent in the 15,000 meters the team athletes row, Koch said.

"I think the average time of the people we've got over there is probably three to five minutes," he said.

For those who don't want to try the rowing machines, the teams encourage donations.

SHOOTING to the TOP

Senior guard's 3-pointers key to women's offensive success

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

It's no secret.

In basketball, the key to beating the opponent lies in limiting their strength — their specialty. For K-State, that strength is Kim Woodlee, and her specialty is hitting three-pointers — a lot of them.

Even head coach Deb Patterson won't deny the biggest element of K-State's success on the offensive side of the ball is Woodlee's uncanny ability to drop three-pointers on the Cats' competition almost on demand.

"Everyone understands that a lot of K-State's offense is directed towards trying to put her in the situation to maximize what she brings to the floor because it is special," she said.

What the senior brings to the floor each night is the school's all-time best shooting stroke from beyond the arc, one that has produced 56 treys so far this season and 263 for her career, a K-State record.

With success, though, comes respect, and in basketball terms that means more pressure from opposing defenses, something Woodlee said she welcomes as a sacrifice to her teammates.

"I can't remember the last completely open three-pointer I've taken," the 5-foot-8 guard said. "The defense has gotten tighter, and that's great for our inside game because they don't want to back off Kristin Rethman or myself which leaves them one-on-one in the post."

School records for three-point field goals, attempts and percentage already in tow, Woodlee now takes aim at the conference three-point record of 274, a milestone said didn't enter her mind until her success attracted the attention.

"I've had several questions from the media to put it in my mind," she said, "but otherwise, I don't think it would be there. It seems like the more you think of it, the more pressure you get from other people to break it."

"It's something that would be great to achieve," Woodlee said. "But that's not my primary focus; we're 1-5 in the Big 12."

Although Woodlee's hot hand from downtown hasn't paid off in the form of many conference wins for the Wildcats this season, her leadership skills, as one of only four seniors on the squad, have helped K-State's young players mature quickly.

"Kim is very much the leader of our team," Rethman said. "She keeps us going at times, she wants to win."

That will to win, along with her confidence in her basketball abilities and a sink-or-swim immersion into Patterson's system as a freshman demanded that Woodlee mature quickly, and the Beersheba Springs, Tenn., native didn't disappoint.

"We hoped that she could make an impact as a shooter, that was her strength," Patterson said, "but I can't say that I expected her to build on Missy Decker's record (176), especially making the transition to the Big 12, where the competition is bigger, stronger and quicker."

Decker's total would fall in Woodlee's junior season, as would records for three-point attempts and percentage. Woodlee's 42.8 percentage from behind the arc last season is the top mark, and she owns the next two spots in that category as well.

Patterson has not allowed her star sharpshooter to get a big head, though. In fact, Woodlee said, she rarely ever sees her shot when assessing a game's film.

"Coach Patterson does a good job of fast forwarding those parts," she said. "I can't say I've seen a lot of my three-point shots in film."

She does, however, appreciate how she has grown to become less hesitant and more confident in her ability to take the shot that she was brought to K-State to take.

"Now, I don't hesitate at all. If I don't take the shot, it's bad for our team," Woodlee said. "We have to take the shot because it's as good a shot as a layup for Kristin or myself to be beyond the arc with a look."

Beyond the arc with a look is a place she's often been in her career as a Wildcat, a spot where she said she feels comfortable making her presence felt on the hardwood.

"Anyone that has ever watched a K-State game knows that I'm not out there for my speed or my incredible defensive capabilities," Woodlee said with a laugh. "I'm out there because I'm a scoring threat beyond the arc. If I'm not taking those shots, or I'm passing up shots I should be taking, you better believe my butt's going to be out of there."

With her time at K-State fading, Woodlee already has established her legacy as one of the Wildcats' finest shooters, but is quick to say that the future looks even brighter for the Cats.

"We just helped to lay the foundation for what is going to be a great basketball team," she said.

Kim Woodlee takes a three-point shot during a game earlier this season in Bramlage Coliseum. Woodlee needs 12 more three-pointers to break the all-time men and women's Big 12 three-point record.

KU, K-State matchup this weekend important to basketball teams

Showdown Saturday is upon us, and Willie wants you.

With two basketball games against intrastate rival Kansas lined up for Super Bowl-eve, homework should take a back seat to an evening date at Bramlage followed up by a long spell spent on the couch this weekend.

K-State's women take the Bramlage Coliseum court at 7 p.m. to finish off Saturday's basketball against the Jayhawks, a team that forced a season high 29 Wildcat turnovers just 11 days ago in a loss to the University of Kansas in Lawrence. Expect the Cats to come out with a chip on their shoulder after dropping a tough, close heartbreaker against Missouri on Saturday, after snatching their first conference win against a ranked Texas Longhorns team Jan. 17.

For those of you who think women's basketball is only slightly more competitive than your local pickup game at the old folks home, come out to Bramlage and let Deb Patterson's squad change your mind with a dose of sharpshooters Kim Woodlee and Kristin Rethman.

Admission and parking are free, and while you're there, you'll see K-State's best-ever three-point shooters, Woodlee and Rethman, take aim at the Jayhawks' defense. You'll also see Big 12 freshman of the year candidate Nicole Ohlde, a Clay Center native, and Shalondra Booker, whose ability to create with her defense is both exciting and explosive.

Patterson's team is truly on the rise, and once preseason newcomer of the year Laurie Koehn returns next year from her injury, expect K-State to beat the Jayhawks regularly. They deserve your support Saturday against a Kansas team that can be beaten if the K-State crowd shows up to support its team.

If you haven't been to Bramlage to see the new facelift, it's something to see, and a packed house against KU would mean a lot to Woodlee, who also is chasing the conference three-point mark in her final year at K-State.

And, thanks to a clever scheduling person over at the athletic department, Cat fans have a chance to see both of their teams play Saturday.

Before the women take care of business in Manhattan, you can catch head coach Jim Woodridge's squad shock the nation on TV. The men play at 7 p.m. Saturday at Allen Fieldhouse, and the way Larry Reid, Travis Reynolds and Matt Siebrandt are playing this season against ranked opponents, anything is possible against No. 4 Kansas in Lawrence, including a clean sweep of the hated Jayhawks on a day when K-State has a legitimate chance to claim bragging rights in the Sunflower State.

With an already impressive 2-1 record against ranked teams in his short tenure at the helm of a depleted men's team, Woodridge has passed an early test for K-State basketball fans in games against clubs that former coach Tom Asbury seemed to lie down for in his days as head coach.

Woodridge's plan to bring K-State back to its glory days of basketball success seems to be progressing quite nicely, and don't be surprised to see the Cats raise some eyebrows come Big 12 tournament time this year.

All of this, of course, precedes the biggest day of the NFL season, Super Bowl Sunday, so call your friends and move the party up one day to catch more action in the Cats' two big wins Saturday than in the entire Giants-Ravens game, and then get started on that reading you've put off since the first week of class.

MIXED MEDIA

Instructor displays

alchemic images

Different, exciting, complex, cutting edge and beautiful.

These are just some of the words Manhattan residents used to describe Dane Webster's photographic artwork at his reception Friday. Showing through Feb. 3 at Urban Designs in Aggieville, Webster's artwork is a style Manhattan experiences little of.

Webster, instructor of photography and computer animation at K-State, said he has an experimental approach to his thematically based pieces.

Webster combines media in such a way that manipulated images seem real. This reflects his view that memories are important not for their exactness, but for their changing significance to the person with the memory, he said.

Webster said his experimental processing methods add to the complexity of his images. He enjoys trying something completely different and likes to surprise himself.

"My favorite part of creating is arriving at unexpected results. I like using new techniques and processes and, with photography, I have lots of options," Webster said.

Although he does consider himself an artist, he doesn't necessarily see himself as a photographer, he said. His images are complex and different from the standard photograph.

STORY BY BECKY FISCHER

"I see myself as a sort of anti-photographer," he said. "I did the clean gallery look — develop the photo, mount on white paper, place behind glass — but I wanted to get away from that, to break away from the norm."

Deborah Minner, co-owner of Urban Designs, said she recognized Webster's art as unique. When she saw Webster's portfolio, she said she really liked his work and wanted to get it into the next possible show, which was this one.

"One of the things I like best about Dane's work is the way he's combining images into a new context," Minner said. "It really makes you stop and think about it — is that image something that really happened?" Minner said the show has drawn many people. It has received positive feedback, and people are intrigued with what he's doing.

"Dane's work is very unique, not just to what I show, but to art. It's representative of the new direction art is going into, very cutting edge," she said.

Webster combines photographs with metal, paint, copies and other media in creating his pieces. The actual photographs, and final pieces, reflect his unique view of photography, he said.

"I look at photography like the old-time alchemy with the element of not knowing what's going to happen," Webster said. "Because I've worked with photography a lot, I know what things will do. So, I try to stay as naive as possible in trying new things."

Consequently, the pieces come out quite large, with one of them around two feet long by five feet tall.

Doug Minner, co-owner of Urban Designs, said that was one detail that grabbed his attention.

"The size of the art takes you at first," he said. "Then you see the small details in each work that shows how each piece has a lot to say."

Photography itself was a new thing to Webster when he was forced to take the class as a requirement for his bachelor's degree in art from Weber State University. He talked to the department head about getting out of the class.

"I ended up having to take it. It only took three or four weeks to realize I loved it," Webster said.

He went on to earn his master's degree (with an emphasis in photography/digital imaging) just last year from Washington State University.

"The Birth of Athena" is by Brian McCallum.

His girlfriend decided to come to K-State for graduate studies, and Webster said it was his turn to follow.

Some describe Webster's getting his job at K-State as lucky. He'd had a job lined up, but heard K-State was hiring and decided to go for it.

"I actually applied for a different position, but Bob Hower, head of visual communications, told me they needed a photography instructor."

"When I was interviewed for the job, I told them they might not get the most experience, but they'd get plenty of energy," Webster said.

He felt excited and lucky when he got the job. Another surprise came when Webster was given the opportunity to instruct a new class, computer animation.

"They offer a similar class over in computer science. That class focuses more on the mathematical aspects, but I wanted this class to focus on the creative aspects."

The class is in trial-run stages, Webster said, but the students are very interested. The photography class also is going well.

Webster said he likes teaching these classes because students want to take them and are excited about them.

There are many aspects of teaching he enjoys with one in particular.

"Absolutely my favorite part of teaching is interaction with the students. I think approachability with mentorship is key," he said.

Webster said he wants his students to feel comfortable talking to him about their ideas. Also, he said he encourages them to go beyond the standard ways of creating.

"I motivate my students to explore," Webster said. "I want them to go beyond the norm."

City manager open to residents' ideas

By CRISTINA JANNEY
Kansas State Collegian

Despite the large web of city employees poised to assist residents with their concerns, sometimes people want to go all the way to the top.

That means Ron Fehr, city manager, spends a lot of time dealing with residents' concerns, but it is something his co-workers say he does best.

Fehr, 42, took over the city manager position in April but has worked for the city since 1982.

"He has a strong, caring side," Diane Stoddard, assistant city manager, said. "He is very attentive to people's concerns."

Fehr is patient with people and takes care to follow-up on their concerns, said Stoddard, who has worked with Fehr for five years.

"If he gives someone his word, it is extremely important. It means a lot," she said. "He expects the same thing from the people he works with."

Fehr said he didn't think students were very involved in the discussion of city issues, but he said that was typical of most residents.

"There has to be an issue that hits their hot button," he said.

Students remain a huge, vital part of the community, he said.

Mandatory rental inspection might be an incentive that could draw students to K-State, but there are costs to landlords, he said.

"It's unfair to respectable landlords who are doing a good job," he said. "They would have to pay more and would probably pass the cost on for that kind of program."

The University of Missouri graduate said he bleeds purple. Fehr spent his first two years of his undergraduate education at K-State before transferring to Missouri to complete a degree in forestry. He would later earn a master's degree in public administration from K-State.

Fehr transferred into Missouri after winter break after ending a temporary position with the forestry service.

The first basketball game he attended was Missouri versus K-State. When K-State made its first basket, he stood up and cheered.

"I looked around and realized this was not going to be fun," he said.

When a position came open in the Manhattan Department of Parks and Recreation in 1982, he saw it as a good opportunity to come back to Manhattan.

Fehr had to use all of his strengths when he was given the task to deal with concerns over a new law: the Americans with Disabilities Act.

Fehr had recently taken the position as assistant city manager.

Despite Fehr's attempts to soothe the concerns of one particular resident, the conflict erupted into a multi-million-dollar lawsuit. The lawsuit was one of the first of its kind in the nation, and other municipalities were looking to the suit for direction on how to comply with the law.

"He did an appropriate job. There was a lot of difficulty in that law, because it was brand new," Bill Frost, city attorney, said.

Frost joined the city before Fehr and has seen him move up the ranks.

He said Fehr has matured and gained knowledge but is fundamentally the same honest and sensitive person he always has been.

Fehr said issues such as affordable housing, transportation and an adequate labor pool are facing the city as it grows, but much revolves around the census figures that are due out at the end of March or early April.

The city comes on the radar screen of many businesses when it hits that 50,000 mark, he said.

If Manhattan has 50,000 residents or more, it also becomes an entitlement city, which would guarantee it certain funds for projects like a transportation system.

"It would be difficult to support a transit program without the entitlement funds," he said.

Mayor Karen McCulloh said Fehr's skills of cooperation and consensus building are what the city needs in this time of growth. The city has done several studies but needs someone to follow through with those ideas.

She said Fehr was that person.

Fehr said some cities are just in the business of providing basic services like police, fire and water, but that Manhattan was different.

"This is a very dynamic community. Most people expect more than that," Fehr said. "It is not the role of the city to do everything. It is the challenge of the city and community leaders to decide what is."

President submits education proposal

By ANJETTA McQUEEN
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Bush, seeking Democratic support for an education package submitted to Congress on Tuesday, promised more help to troubled schools before shifting more federal funds to private institutions.

"Our goal is to improve public education," Bush said in an East Room send-off for an education agenda that centers around vouchers for private school education, the most divisive part of his program to hold public schools accountable for student learning.

Bush said he wants to require annual state reading and math tests for students in every grade in order to gather reliable data on "who's falling behind and who needs help."

"Once failing schools are identified, we'll help them improve. We'll help them help themselves," said Bush, with Education Secretary-designate Rod Paige at his side.

In Bush's plan, his signature campaign issue, failing schools have three years to get up to standards, so that pupils are able to achieve, before federal funds are stripped for other uses such as vouchers.

"When schools do not teach and will not change, parents and students must have other meaningful options," Bush said.

Bush, who said he wanted legislation enacted by summer so that school districts have time to implement reforms for the 2001-02 academic year, met privately Tuesday morning with top congressional Republicans and Democrats who oversee education policy-making.

Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said afterward that despite differences over vouchers, Democrats are eager to work with him on education.

"The areas which he pointed out where we are in agreement, I thought were very substantial. I, for one, am interested in getting some action on education overhaul," Kennedy said outside the West Wing.

"What is important today is that we have a president that wants to make this a strong priority on education and I think we have those that have leadership positions in the House and Senate that want to work with him and get something meaningful done," the Democrat said.

A Bush official, speaking on condition of anonymity Monday, said

Bush had decided on some changes to his voucher plan to win over hostile Democrats.

Bush is proposing additional funding — beyond even what he proposed during his campaign. Corrective measures for such schools would include allowing students to use federal money for transportation to a public school with a better record. Removing the school principal would be another second-year option.

Bush, who called education "the most fundamental of American issues," is making education his first large-scale policy initiative. The plan mirrors his campaign platform — a $47.6 billion plan to shape up failing schools, increase the student-testing regimen, hand districts more control over federal dollars and make sure all children can read by age 9.

The campus and community are invited to an open house celebrating Sigma Kappa sorority's 10th anniversary.

Group attempts suicide in China

By MARTIN FACKLER
The Associated Press

BEIJING — Five Falun Gong followers set themselves on fire Tuesday in China's Tiananmen Square, the most radical act yet by sect members in defiance of the communist government's 18-month ban on their movement.

One follower died in the attempted group suicide, which prompted police to tighten security and then close the square in the opening hours of China's lunar new year.

After weeks of words, both the spiritual movement and communist government have turned to brasher tactics.

Falun Gong has stepped up demonstrations in recent weeks and issued warnings by founder Li Hongzhi of more vigorous action to protest the crackdown. The government has fought back by intensifying vilification of the sect in state-controlled media and supporting a nationwide campaign to collect a million signatures.

The campaign is the government's first effort to make people publicly support the ban and is reminiscent of communist political movements — from the 1950-53 Korean War to the radical Cultural Revolution in the 1960s.

"It's a way of forcing people to be a bit upfront," said Gerry Groot of Adelaide University in Australia. "This is real classic 1950s tactics. That's exactly what they did during the Korean War to try to undermine the Americans."

The government's efforts have accelerated with the approach of Wednesday's lunar new year, China's biggest holiday. Expecting the same mass protests that marred celebrations last year, police checked people entering the square, patting many down and inspecting their bags.

Still, five sect followers managed to douse themselves with gasoline in the middle of the square and set themselves on fire in two suicidal blazes, the government's Xinhua News Agency said.

Police rushed to the site, Xinhua said. The brief report added that one woman burned to death, and the surviving injured were taken to a hospital.

A producer and cameraman with CNN witnessed the protest. CNN reported that one man sat down, poured gasoline on himself and set himself on fire. Moments later, the journalists saw four more people on fire, staggering forward, their hands raised in a meditation pose.

Police confiscated CNN's videotape and detained the journalists for 90 minutes. Officers at the Tiananmen Square police station refused comment, referring all questions to Xinhua.

The group suicide attempt brought even tighter security, which blocked all but a few dozen revelers from gathering on the square to welcome the Year of the Snake. As firecrackers crackled around Beijing after midnight, police cleared even them from the square.

State media have accused followers of committing suicide at the instigation of sect leader Li, something Falun Gong has denied. But Tuesday's self-immolation was the first independently confirmed suicide attempt by group members.

The group drew millions of followers in the 1990s, preaching a mix of slow-motion exercises and eclectic ideas followers say promote health and good citizenship. The government outlawed the group in July 1999, accusing Li, now believed to be living in the United States, of deceiving practitioners and causing the death of 1,600 followers.

With Beijing bidding this year to be host the 2008 Olympics, China is keen to gain the upper hand in the struggle. Its repression is taking its toll on the group, with thousands forced to recant in deprogramming centers and labor camps. A Hong Kong-based rights group counts 104 deaths from abuse in custody.

"We don't want cults, these poisons, to harm our society," said Wang Yusheng, secretary-general of the China Anti-Cult Association, whose drive to collect 1 million signatures has received intensive coverage in state media.

"If Falun Gong practitioners can go to Tiananmen Square to create disturbances, then we can organize and rouse the masses behind a 1 million-signature campaign," Wang said.

CANDIDATES

"I felt that voters needed more choice," he said.

In particular, Johnson said the city budget has soared under recent commissions, and Manhattan still doesn't have enough job opportunities to keep recent K-State graduates in town.

"I think it's time for a change," he said.

Rich Vargo, county clerk and election official, said these runoffs are not rare. In fact, he said, it is unusual that only the city commission needs two elections with numerous school board elections also gearing up.

"We just always prepare for it and assume we're always going to have it," he said.

The primary election is estimated to eventually cost the city about $15,000 due to costs like ballot printing and labor. Advance voting will be available Feb. 7 through noon Feb. 26 at the county clerk's office, and citywide polls will be in place Feb. 27, Vargo said.

Once the candidate receiving the fewest votes is eliminated in the primary, the other six candidates will compete in the April 3 general election.

Candidates receiving the highest and second-highest number of votes will each receive four-year terms on the commission. The candidate in third place will receive a two-year term. Sitting commissioners Bruce Snead and Ed Klimek are each serving terms that will expire in 2003. In this manner, three seats on the five-member commission are always up for election in odd-numbered years.

City Manager Ron Fehr said the three newly elected commissioners will take their seats at the April 17 meeting. At the same time, commissioners will also replace Mayor Karen McCulloh with the next annual mayor from among the commission. Traditionally, the title of mayor moves in order of year elected, then the commissioners' number of votes. "If the commission follows tradition," Fehr said, "Bruce Snead will be elected mayor."

for two semesters because it's a good program, not because she needs something to do for two hours.

"I know that people don't use it enough, but the people who do use it feel safer. That's what makes volunteering worthwhile," Powell said.

Wildcat Walk is considered by volunteers, the coordinator and the adviser to be a program that offers peace of mind more than protection.

Wildcat Walk adviser Jean Darbyshire said the crime statistics show that K-State has a fairly safe campus. The numbers alone, however, don't always make people feel safe.

"It gives students on campus the peace of mind to know that they don't have to walk across campus alone in the dark," Darbyshire said. "It's one less thing students have to worry about."

SHOOTING

Jones said there are no policies regarding off-campus parties, and they are not authorized by K-State. She said parties are the responsibility of those sponsoring the event and the property owner. She said, however, K-State will provide support to students that were at the party and provide them with the help they need.

Shaun S. Leach, 4-1 Field Artillery, Fort Riley, died from a gunshot wound to his torso. He was the passenger in a 1995 Honda driven by James Hawthorne, also of the 4-1 Field Artillery. Hawthorne suffered a gunshot wound to his leg.

The Riley County Police Department still is investigating the incident.

Capt. Gary Grubbs, investigations division, said there are no suspects in custody at this time and they have not yet determined a motive. He said, though, there has been progress made in the case.

"We do have some evidence that is being examined by the Kansas Bureau of Investigation, but I won't disclose what it is at this time," he said.

Grubbs said anyone with information, or anyone who was on the scene during the shooting, can contact the police department at 537-2112.

Parking Council approves increase in prices

By CHARLIE MORASCH
Kansas State Collegian

Students, faculty and visitors probably will be paying more to park on campus.

The Parking Council met Tuesday and approved motions to raise meter prices, student and faculty parking pass prices and to faculty reserved stall prices.

If the President's Council and university vice president approve the Parking Council's proposed changes, starting July 1, parking meters will cost 60 cents per hour instead of 50 cents per hour now. Student yearly parking passes will increase from $60 to $70, while yearly faculty parking passes will increase from $85 to $90. Faculty reserved 12-hour parking stalls will increase from $500 to $600, and 24-hour parking stalls will go from $600 to $750.

However, not everyone believes these measures will pass.

"I really think that the vice president will send them back to the committee, and that they'll have to be changed again," said Molly Caton, sophomore in family studies and human services and Student Senate representative of the Parking Council. "Jake Worcester and I have talked, and we both agree that this probably won't pass."

Caton said certain factors such as the proposed bus system in Manhattan make the future too unpredictable to currently raise rates.

"If the bus system in Manhattan is going to be under way, that could really change things," Caton said.

Darwin Abbott, director of Parking Services, said increasing costs and more demands for Parking Services were some of the factors that led to the need for increases in parking costs.

"Energy and electricity costs have gone up," Abbott said. "And we want to keep working to meet the needs of our customers, and more maintenance is just one of those needs."

Abbott also said Parking Services is currently experiencing high costs, but they should not stay high for long.

"We're putting up a whole new computer system, and doing maintenance on parking lots that will make them cost less to maintain in the future," Abbott said.

Caton said she believes Parking Services is trying to level out the gap between student and faculty parking passes, even though faculty parking is closer to the center of campus.

"I think this committee is slowly trying to make the prices the same," Caton said. "Our answer is that if they're going to be close to the same, or the same, that parking should be first come first serve."

Caton said she and Student Body President Jake Worcester are interested in slowing down the process of these price changes until students can be better represented.

"Jake's talked to the vice president of K-State, and I think that we're going to slow this down," Caton said.

Abbott said the increases are necessary because there haven't been any parking increases since 1995.

"We're non-profit, but we need

Kezia Holden, sophomore in architectural engineering, and Katie Crawford, senior in construction science and management, make rounds in Goodnow Hall on Friday night. Responsibilities of resident assistants include some on-call shifts and making rounds to be sure residents are not disruptive. This is Crawford's second year as a resident assistant.

RESIDENTS on DUTY

Assistants available to alleviate problems, make security rounds

With a pager strapped around her neck, Katie Crawford waited.

In fact, she spent most of the weekend waiting because she was on duty.

As one of Goodnow Hall's resident assistants, Crawford was responsible for any problem that occurred in the residence hall during the weekend.

Crawford, senior in construction science and management, said Goodnow RAs have the duty two weekends a semester, from 5 p.m. Friday until 5 p.m. Sunday, when they are on call with only one other RA.

She said this includes making two security rounds of the residence hall a night and answering any emergency pages.

"On our security rounds, we make sure all lights are working, all doors are locked and that there are no problems," she said. "We also have to be available anytime a resident has a noise complaint, a problem with alcohol, things like that."

CAMPUS after dark

Editor's note: This story is the fourth of a Collegian series featuring articles about the people who work and study on campus at night.

Crawford said she usually doesn't receive more than one or two pages a night.

"Usually we don't have a lot of things that happen," she said. "A lot of the things are petty, like when people go home for the weekend and forget to turn off their alarms. Then we have to go into their rooms and turn them off."

Goodnow RA Devin Schehrer, junior in secondary education, said there are times they do receive more potentially serious pages, including maintenance problems, suspicious odors and alcohol and drug complaints.

"I have also seen residents and guests arrested," Schehrer said. "That's never a fun situation at all."

Forums set to discuss bus system

By RACHEL POWERS
Kansas State Collegian

Faculty and staff will have the opportunity today in the Union Courtyard to voice their concerns and questions about a possible citywide bus system.

The forum, lead by TransSystems Inc., is an opportunity for students to see what the preliminary plans look like for a bus system. It will be from 1 to 3 p.m.

"There will be maps of preferred street routes displayed along with surveys to see what people really want and where the most interest is," said Karen Davis, Manhattan director of community services.

Darwin Abbott, director of Parking Services, said consultants will show what they have been working on.

"We want feedback on their plans," he said. "It's not final. We are just gathering ideas."

He said they count on students to get feedback.

An 18-member committee has been formed by the city of Manhattan. To develop a plan, the committee has been working in conjunction with the university to find out what the community wants. Abbott said they are working to find a common interest.

Students, faculty and staff can expect to see maps with preferred routes at the event. "Essentially, we are proposing a fixed two-route system running from the northeast to southeast and northwest to southwest area of Manhattan," Davis said. "It creates a big X."

Included in the preliminary pricing is an Aggieville Special, Davis said. "This would run on a deviated fixed schedule, running every hour rather than half hour, like the others," she said. "Students would be able to be dropped off at their house in the Aggieville area rather than one specific stop. The buses would also run Friday and Saturday evenings to accommodate those students who don't want to drink and drive."

Today:

TransSystems will lead two forums today. One will be from 1 to 3 p.m. in the Union Courtyard; the other at 5:30 p.m. at the Manhattan Fire Station large assembly room.

Memorial to honor student today at All Faiths Chapel

By APRIL MIDDLETON
Kansas State Collegian

The life of a K-State student whose friends say lived every moment to the fullest, will be honored in a memorial at 4:30 p.m. today in All Faiths Chapel.

"A lot of people will miss him, but we'll always remember him," John Graham, junior in accounting, said.

Sam Wise, junior in park resource management, was found dead at 12:03 a.m. Jan. 16 in his apartment, 1520 Oxford Place.

An autopsy was performed Tuesday in Manhattan. Riley County Police Department Sgt. Connie Miller said Wise died from a self-inflicted gunshot wound.

Wise graduated from Satanta Junior/Senior High School in 1998 and took classes at Seward County Community College. He started at K-State in fall 1998.

With the help of administrators, students have organized a memorial service to celebrate the life of their friend and peer.

Keira Mann, sophomore in creative writing, will begin the service, and prayer will follow. Following prayer, there will be

News of the weird

A 22-year-old man died of massive head injuries after jumping reflexively out of an open convertible to avoid a cigarette butt flicked by the driver (Virginia Beach, Va., October).

Committee delays vote on Ashcroft confirmation

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee forced a one-week delay Wednesday in voting on Attorney General-designate John Ashcroft, with one panel member, Sen. Dianne Feinstein, announcing her opposition to the nominee.

During a meeting that had been called with the intention of voting on Ashcroft's confirmation, the panel's top Democrat, Patrick Leahy of Vermont, said Democrats want written answers to hundreds of questions before deciding on the former Missouri senator's fitness to join President Bush's Cabinet.

Feinstein, however, needed no further information to declare she believes Ashcroft has an "ultra right-wing" record on civil rights, women's rights, school desegregation and gun safety. His nearly 30-year record as state attorney general, governor and senator contradicts his stated commitment to enforce laws with which he disagrees, she argued.

"So the question each senator must now ask is whether this transformation is really plausible after 25 years of advocating on the other side," Feinstein said.

Bush, in a Wednesday morning meeting with the bipartisan congressional leadership, sounded unconcerned when asked about the Democrats' delay. "I think they're making sure that when they confirm him, all questions have been answered," the president said.

Numerous liberal interest groups — including the NAACP, Planned Parenthood Federation of America and the civil liberties group People for the American Way — are pressuring Democrats to oppose Ashcroft's nomination. Critics insist the deeply held convictions of the conservative former Missouri senator, a staunch opponent of abortion and gun control, might prevent him from enforcing laws with which he disagrees.

Judge grants custody of Internet twins to father

ST. LOUIS — A judge granted the biological father temporary custody of twin daughters adopted twice via the Internet, the same day a British court ruled that the girls should remain in foster care in England.

The birth mother, who also has said she wants the girls back, faces her own court hearing in March for an alleged probation violation.

The girls were born to Tranda Wecker in St. Louis in June, shortly after she divorced Aaron Wecker. They were being adopted by a California couple, Richard and Vickie Allen of San Bernardino, who paid $6,000 to an Internet placement service called A Caring Heart.

Tranda Wecker took the girls back after two months and turned them over to a British couple, Judith and Alan Kilshaw, who paid $12,000 to the service. The service's operator has since disappeared, and British welfare officials took the girls into custody.

The girls' exact whereabouts weren't made public, and the effect of the St. Louis ruling was unclear.

In the St. Louis custody hearing, Aaron Wecker alleged in court documents that his former wife neglected the twins by trying to "sell" them twice on the Internet. He also accused her of not telling him where the girls were for weeks at a time and "subjecting the twins to illegal activities and underhanded and shady doings."

Court records also show that Aaron Wecker has custody of a 3-year-old child he had with Tranda Wecker, 28.

Associate Circuit Judge Jack Garvey's ruling on Tuesday prohibits her from coming within 100 feet of the infants and gives Aaron Wecker custody until at least Feb. 14, when another hearing is scheduled.

Explosions responsible for submarine's demise

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. — Analysis of seismic waves supports conclusions that two onboard explosions, not a collision, destroyed a Russian submarine in August, killing all 118 crew members.

The first explosion was relatively small, consistent with a misfiring torpedo aboard the Kursk, according to a report by Arizona and New Mexico researchers published Tuesday in the geophysical journal Eos. That blast was followed about two minutes later by an explosion 250 times larger than the first, the researchers said.

Most investigators have said they believed an explosion sank the sub in the Barents Sea on Aug. 12, but Russian researchers have left open the possibility of a collision — possibly with a ship shadowing the sub.

Students work with children

By JESSICA PITTS
Kansas State Collegian

Helping children succeed has become the reason why Jillian Likes started the mentor program at Blumont Elementary school a year and a half ago.

"We help these children with everyday things that prepares them for their next year in school," Likes, sophomore in elementary education, said. "We help deal with the problem areas and catch them up to their grade level."

HOSTS, Helping One Student To Succeed, is a mentoring program that pairs a kindergarten to sixth grade student who needs help in reading with a community volunteer as a mentor.

"It gives us the ability to give all the students individual attention," said Bridget Troyer, teacher for the HOST program. "The one-to-one teaching lets the students learn faster and helps them become more self-reliant. They work at their own pace, so they don't feel left behind. It increases their self-confidence."

All lesson plans are done ahead of time for the mentors, and they are all individualized to the student, Troyer said.

Likes said she helps the children she works with on reading and recognizing words.

"A lot of the kids I work with are good in one area, but struggle in another," she said. "Some are good readers, they just can't remember words, or they are fast readers, but they can't connect with the material. It really is a mixture of things which kind of keeps it interesting."

Tanner Shaw, freshman in engineering, works with four students in the three and a half hours he volunteers each week.

"It is really fun helping them with their reading or spelling," he said. "It is also encouraging to see some improvement. It is a long and slow process at times, but definitely worth it."

Troyer said most of the volunteers are K-State students, but she encourages anyone to volunteer.

"We are real flexible with our mentors, and there is always a place for another one," she said.

"As long as there is someone there who cares and wants to help, it really doesn't matter about their background. They become an important person in the child's life and most realize that and do a great job."

Likes said she enjoys seeing the five to six children she works with improve in their areas.

Third grader Shequoyia Vereen reads with HOSTS volunteer Tanner Shaw, freshman in architectural engineering. The program Help One Student To Succeed at Blumont Elementary School focuses on motivating students to read by pairing them with adult mentors.

JEANEL DRAKE/Collegian

"It makes me feel good to know that I have done something to help them," she said. "And that they actually responded to my help. It is a great feeling."

Troyer said she is grateful to the volunteers and wants to encourage others to become mentors because of how rewarding the program is.

"The strength of the mentors is that they come in and carry out the lesson plans in order to help the students," she said. "But in return, the mentors are receiving the benefits of knowing they helped someone succeed."

County recycling rates lead to talk of city plan

By DAVID PLOUS
Kansas State Collegian

Recycling rates for five of the seven recycling categories in Riley County are below the national average.

Glass is recycled at a rate of 32.1 percent in Riley County, compared to 26 percent nationally, and aluminum is recycled at 76 percent in Riley County, while nationally it's recycled at a 34.2-percent rate. These are the only two categories in which Riley County is above the national average, according to a December 1999 survey of Riley County citizens.

The study was conducted by a K-State research team to determine the attitudes of citizens in the community about a curbside recycling program. Now, residents who wish to recycle must take their recyclables to a recycling center, such as Howie's Recycling.

A curbside program could raise the recycling rates of newspaper, magazines, mixed office paper, plastic and steel cans — the five categories in which Riley County trails the national average.

In a curbside program, residents are asked to put out their recyclables on assigned days, like trash pickup. It would make it so residents would not have to take recyclables to a drop off center.

Two issues that must be addressed are the cost to consumers and how often pickup will be.

Despite the apparent benefits, Riley County has no plans to start a curbside recycling program. The county's population is not dense enough to make it cost effective. However, there might be developments in the coming months at the city level.

Monte Wedel, director of planning and development for Riley County, said he thinks Riley County will ask the city of Manhattan to seek funding for a curbside program.

"In order for curbside to be successful, it must be done in an area with a high population density to make it cost effective," he said.

The results of the study will be presented to the Manhattan City Commission next month for consideration.

ABC tickets in Manhattan

By APRIL MIDDLETON
Kansas State Collegian

Alcoholic Beverage Control agents made their presence known in Manhattan by issuing 35 people citations for violating Kansas Liquor Laws.

A report released Tuesday by the Department of Revenue contained results of a large-scale check conducted by ABC in Manhattan and Lawrence on Jan. 12 and 13.

Approximately 13 agents made bar checks and worked with liquor stores to conduct the "Cops-in-Shops" program in both cities.

The focus of the operation was to enforce underage drinking laws and make sure establishments with liquor licenses were complying with state laws.

Scott Holeman, communications director for the Department of Revenue, said ABC maintains a constant presence in Manhattan and Lawrence throughout the year. However, large-scale operations such as this are done at least once a semester in college towns, such as Manhattan and Lawrence.

"We want people to know that ABC agents are out there enforcing the law," Holeman said.

In Manhattan, 26 citations were issued to minors for the possession of alcohol. Eight people were cited for furnishing alcohol to minors and one person was issued a citation for transporting an open container.

Agents in Lawrence issued a total of 36 citations. Six people were cited for furnishing alcohol to minors and two were cited for the use of false identification. Twenty-eight citations were issued to minors in the possession of alcohol.

Five Lawrence establishments were also issued administrative citations for liquor violations.

Holeman said the number of citations issued in both cities is typical.

"Operations like this allow us to make sure all Kansas liquor laws are being followed," Holeman said.

The Collegian's Campus Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on topics relevant to the publication.

On the Topic:

What about the Bush Administration are you looking forward to?

No more Clinton.

I'm looking forward to lots of things about the Bush administration. Among them: degradation of minors and homosexuals, infringement on women's reproductive rights, inadequate foreign policies, persecution of religious minorities, and especially, racist attorney generals.

What I'm looking forward to about the Bush administration is all of the Dennis Miller jokes about Texas.

I'm looking forward to George W. putting oil rigs and pipe lines through every last piece of unspoiled land in the United States. I think the elk and I will really appreciate that.

In the Bush administration, I am most looking forward to nuclear proliferation, destruction of the Alaskan wildlife and reduced rights for women and minorities.

November 2004.

I'm looking forward to the end of the Bush administration.

I'm looking forward to the reversal of Roe v. Wade baby.

With the new Bush administration, I most look forward to moral responsibility, dignity and respect being restored to the White House.

I am truly going to enjoy watching our new president's approval rating fall into the single digits.

As far as the new Bush administration, I am personally looking forward to learning new and improved ways to screw up the English language. Thanks W.

I look forward to the end of the Bush administration.

The thing I'm looking most forward to about the Bush administration is at the end of the four years when it's over. Bring it on.

I'm looking forward to Bush not pardoning 140 lawbreakers.

The thing I'm looking forward most to with the Bush administration is "Saturday Night Live."

I look forward to laughing myself silly when I watch on the news as our president makes Americans look like a bunch of fools.

Hindering JUSTICE

Carruth's trial shows society's unreadiness for death penalty

I thought the Rae Carruth murder trial would be significant for several reasons. I never thought it would register a compelling argument for ending the death penalty.

Don't get me wrong. Despite all the rational and moral arguments against the death penalty, some deep and vicious part of me has always supported it. Maybe it's the red-meat high-blood-pressure white-knuckle side of me which demands vengeance and screams profanities at clogged traffic. Maybe it's just that I quietly and simply advocate fierce punishment for those who would blatantly abuse the most precious gifts granted to human beings. Maybe I just don't like people.

But whenever the question would be posed — do we have the moral right to take the life of even the most hardened criminal? I wouldn't even think, just nod. Someone's gotta be the life-guard of the gene pool. You drop the gloves, you're out of the game.

But that's a moral issue, and my moral compass is spinning around faster than Calista Flockhart in a blender. The practicality of implementing the death penalty in this country ... well, face it — there isn't any.

Anyone with a brain stem should already be aware of the racial discrepancy which has emerged in death-penalty cases — right now, about half of the death row population is made up of minorities which constitute 20 percent of the nation's population — for a variety of reasons, from selective prosecuting to jury preconceptions to inadequate public defenders. And the labyrinth of legality between sentence given and sentence inflicted makes it as much a life sentence as a death sentence.

Worse, this puts a lot of faith in our legal system — putting a human life into the hands of 12 people who have nothing better to do than sit on a jury for a week or longer. High-profile cases, of course, are much worse, as ignorance with the case is often a prerequisite for being qualified to sit in judgment of it. (I looked over that sentence to make sure I typed it right, and yep, I did — it doesn't make sense, but I still typed it right.)

If anything more hyped than the O.J. Simpson case ever came to trial (like what? State of California v. God?) and you were somehow able to assemble 12 people sufficiently vacuous on the issue, you'd be lucky if any of them could shuffle a deck of cards. As long as jury duty is seen as a punishment and not a civic responsibility you're going to make it a trap and not a calling.

Which brings us back to Rae Carruth.

Carruth was found guilty of conspiring to murder and of firing the gun, but acquitted of the actual murder.

Now, I'm not a math major and I'm not Sherlock friggini Holmes, but I think I can grasp cause-and-effect just enough to figure out that if he's responsible for firing the gun that killed his girlfriend, maybe he killed her. We're not putting people on the moon or landing 747s here. This is not something that would keep Matlock up nights. No need to dust for prints. There are fish that could piece this together.

I'm willing to cut those 12 people enough slack to think that their decision was their attempt to exercise more authority than they really had. This smells like a compromise verdict. To avoid a hung jury and a mistrial, I'm willing to bet that these 12 people compromised — convicting Carruth of lesser charges, but not the charge that could potentially mean his death. They knew what a conviction of murder could entail, and they chose not to risk it — flying in the face of pure logic, they said. "Yep, you pulled the trigger, but you didn't kill her."

They say the death penalty is not a deterrent to crime. This might be the first documentable evidence that the death penalty is a deterrent to conviction. And keep an eye open for a possible appeal on the grounds that this verdict is "Dumber Than Toast."

While I still understand the moral arguments in favor of the death penalty, I cannot believe our legal system has the efficiency, insight or objectivity to render it correctly. Maybe later, when the legal system is matured, will we be able to divine truth with more accuracy than Ryan Leaf after three bottles of NyQuil. And maybe, once our society has also matured, we won't feel the need for the gallows anymore.

Nike's message of empowerment misleading

The movie "What Women Want" obviously had a strong connection, assumingly financially based, with Nike — particularly Nike's respect for women.

A portion of the show is about an advertising agency trying to create an ad campaign to remind women, wearing Nike apparel, to take time for themselves. The ads are essentially telling women to have respect for who they are on a variety of levels.

These commercials are not just limited to the movie; Nike has been trying for years now to motivate people of all ages and gender.

While Nike's commercials show them as being of a strong, high moral level, in the past that same company has been anything but. In fact, the word that springs to mind is hypocritical.

According to the March 30, 1998, issue of Time magazine in an article by Bill Saporito, activist groups alleged that Nike was virtually running slave factories in China. The groups claimed the workers were overpaid and overworked.

Time found that in the Guangdong province of China the average monthly wage for Nike employees is 600 renminbi, or $73. The company also provided dorm rooms that sleep 12 people per unit.

In Vietnam the minimum wage that Nike shelled out was $40 a month. Yet workers were required to take care of their living expenses.

Granted, the cost of living is different, but for a company so prestigious and wealthy, that is a shame.

They are paying Michael Jordan $40 million to endorse their company, yet they only wanted to shell out a very small percentage of their profit to their employees.

Low pay wasn't the only thing wrong in the company's past.

Supervisors have also had cases brought up against them from abused workers. One of the most well-known incidents was at a plant in Vietnam where several women fainted after being forced to run laps as a form of punishment.

So has Nike changed its ways?

Strong evidence points to that answer being no.

In May 1998, president and CEO of Nike, Philip Knight, announced that Nike was going to improve its labor practices, but still he did not mention paying his workers a decent living wage.

According to a link off of the Nike Boycott homepage, there was a summary of an open letter to Nike shareholders that was sent on Sept. 22, 1999.

The letter stated that a human rights organization was condemning Nike's abuse in terms of labor rights. According to the letter, on-site investigators revealed evidence of the following:

- * physical and verbal abuse of workers in Nike factories in Vietnam and El Salvador;
- * the Indonesian military being employed by a Nike contractor to intimidate workers during wage negotiations;
- * Nike refusing to reinstate Vietnamese workers who have been humiliated and dismissed for talking to journalists;
- * workers being sacked for trying to organize unions in Nike factories in El Salvador, Thailand and Indonesia;

* severe fire hazards in a Nike factory in China

The same running shoes that I use to kickbox and run in to make me feel empowered as a woman were probably made at the expense of holding others back.

It is no secret that other companies have had, and have, operations similar to this, if not worse. Yet those sweat, or slave shops reduce the economic gain in terms of employment in the U.S. They also demonstrate a sense of greed from these companies.

The money that Nike has saved by paying ridiculously low wages are probably assisting the funding of advertisements. Ads that refer to strength, but truly signify a weakness known as greed. And that is not what women, or people want.

2 remaining Texas prison escapees surrender at hotel

By P. SOLOMON BANDA
The Associated Press

COLORADO SPRINGS, Colo. — Cornered in a hotel room, the last two Texas prison escapees surrendered without a fight early Wednesday, 42 days after they broke out of a maximum security unit with an arsenal of weapons.

Patrick Murphy Jr., a rapist, and Donald Newbury, a robber, walked barechested out of the hotel room where they had been holed up after about five hours of negotiations with police and an interview with a TV station.

A hotel employee tipped police to the possibility that the fugitives were at the hotel late Tuesday afternoon, Deputy Police Chief Luis Velez said.

The two were shocked when a detective called their room about 10 p.m. Murphy answered and said, "You got us. I don't know how you guys did it, but you got us," Velez recounted.

Like their captured accomplices, they now face capital murder charges in Texas stemming from the slaying of a police officer during a Christmas Eve robbery near Dallas.

Ten loaded handguns and two loaded shotguns were recovered in the hotel room, FBI agent Mark Mershon said. Also recovered was slain officer Aubrey Hawkins' handgun, authorities said.

The men each had a five-minute telephone interview with Colorado Springs' KKTV before surrendering at 3:45 a.m.

Newbury told anchorman Eric Singer the Dec. 13 breakout was a statement against Texas' judicial system.

"We had a statement to make that the system is as corrupt as we are. You going to do something about us, well, do something about that system, too," Newbury said.

Murphy said he was up for parole when he broke out.

"What forced me to do this was the penal institution and such. The way Texas has things set up ... I'd eventually become an outlaw again anyway because of parole stipulations and such.

"I hope that maybe what we're doing here will open the eyes of people."

In Irving, a police spokesman rejected what he said was an attempt by the escapees to characterize themselves as victims of the criminal justice system.

"I don't see that they were the victims. To quote the chief, Officer Hawkins was the victim. We buried the victim," Officer David Tull said.

The inmates promised a peaceful end to the standoff early in the negotiations, and authorities were not surprised they kept that commitment.

"They had their say by telephone, and then we had them back out of the room, shirtless, hands in the air, no weapons on them," Mershon said.

Newbury and Murphy were handcuffed and put into separate patrol cars that slowly rolled out of the parking lot of the Holiday Inn. Their four surviving companions were held in a detention center in Teller County about 20 miles away.

The arrests brought to an end a frustrating hunt — one of the largest in the Southwest's history — for the seven convicts who bluffed their way out of the prison in Kenedy, Texas, after stealing 16 firearms and ammunition from a prison storage area.

Four were arrested peacefully Monday at a convenience store and at a motor home in Woodland Park, 20 miles from Colorado Springs. A fifth killed himself in the motor home as authorities closed in.

Authorities said the men robbed a sporting goods store in Irving and killed Hawkins when he arrived. He was shot 11 times and run over by a vehicle. That heightened fears the men would not surrender peacefully.

"Now we can get down to business and get some changes in this lousy Texas penal system," Jayne Hawkins, the officer's mother, said Wednesday. "My son will not die in vain."

2 killed in plane crash near Denver

By TIFFANY MEREDITH
The Associated Press

DENVER — A private jet crashed after takeoff Wednesday, killing the head of an air cargo company and The Wall Street Journal's aerospace editor.

The plane caught fire after it crashed in a field shortly after it left suburban Front Range Airport, authorities said. There were no radio transmissions from the plane before the crash, Dennis Heap, the airport's aviation director, said.

Michael A. Chowdry, chief executive of Atlas Air Inc., was piloting the L-39, a two-seat Czech jet-trainer, when it crashed. Chowdry was killed along with passenger, Jeff Cole, the Wall Street Journal's aerospace editor. Cole was in Denver to interview Chowdry, according to the Journal.

Atlas Air, based in Purchase, N.Y., hauls cargo for large airlines. It has 1,448 employees and a fleet of 34 Boeing 747 freighters. The company was founded in 1992 by Chowdry in suburban Golden.

Richard Shuyler, Atlas Air executive vice president, said Chowdry, a native of Pakistan, started Atlas Air from a crop-dusting company he took over.

Michael was one of those people who lived the American dream, he said.

Cole joined the Journal as a reporter in Los Angeles in 1992, writing about the aerospace and defense industries. He went to The Seattle Times in 1998 and returned to Journal the following year to assume the role of aerospace editor.

Heap said the plane headed west from the airport and crashed in a field north of Interstate 70, about six miles southeast of Denver International Airport. Eyewitnesses told authorities the plane was flying low to the ground, about 400 to 500 feet.

Junior Alena Jecminkova returns a shot during a match at the Washburn Tennis Facility. Jecminkova has been coming on strong and looks to help the 43rd-ranked Wildcats as the No. 1 singles player.

Cats to face 2 ranked teams

Even though the tennis team faced the No. 2 team in the country last weekend, its schedule is not getting any easier.

The Wildcats face No. 19 Mississippi Saturday and No. 48 New Mexico Sunday at New Mexico.

"Both teams have been in the top 20 or 30 in the country in the last three or four years," head coach Steve Bietau said. "They are both very good teams. We set the standard real high at the beginning of the year and it just makes the picture of what we need to do more clearly."

The tournament marks the beginning of team competition.

"Team competition is completely different," sophomore Petra Sedlmajerova said. "It's all about team points. We are going to have to work more together."

The 19th ranked Rebels set their season off with a 2-0 start. Mississippi sophomore Julie DeRoo is ranked No. 7 in singles. The team has also made eight post-season appearances.

New Mexico is 1-0 on the season. Last year, the Lobos barely slipped past K-State for the win.

"We only lost 5-4," junior Alena Jecminkova said. "We know we have a chance. We are working hard this week to prepare."

Bietau said he believes the team is ready for the challenge.

"I think everyone looks forward to starting the season and I think with early matches like this there is the capacity to improve a lot because you're getting going," Bietau said. "You can cover a lot of ground from the weekend. Typically early season is a time where you can make a lot of progress."

Eva Novotna and Petra Sedlmajerova celebrate their 9-7 victory in their No. 1 doubles match against Kansas in April. The duo erased a 5-2 deficit in the deciding match to give the Wildcats their first victory over the Jayhawks since 1973.

Competition within team helps junior player perfect skills

She may not be a loud, intimidating athlete or the team captain, but Alena Jecminkova is the leader of the tennis team.

The soft-spoken junior is the No. 1 singles player for the 43rd ranked Wildcats.

"She's clearly one of our leaders," Steve Bietau, head coach, said. "She's the best player on the team. I think she would rather not have the tension and everything that goes with being in that position, but as time goes on I think she is accepting that more. When you look at the best teams, their leaders and their top players dictate what happens. If you spend any amount of time with Alena, you don't think of a dictator."

Alternating between the No. 1 and No. 2 singles spots last season, Jecminkova led the team with 23 matches won. Last year, she was named an Intercollegiate Tennis Association Central Region Player to watch.

This season, Jecminkova has picked up right where she left off. In the Georgia Invitational last weekend, she was the only Wildcat to advance as far as the quarterfinals before losing to Georgia's more assertive Lori Grey 6-3, 6-0.

"I am trying to be more aggressive on the court," Jecminkova said. "Even though I felt pretty good on the court against her, I knew she had so much more experience. I knew that was the only thing she was better at. It makes a big difference."

Bietau said getting Jecminkova to release her aggressive side can be difficult.

"I think all tennis players' personalities are just a reflection of their overall personality," he said. "She is a pretty reserved, laid-back person, which doesn't always serve her well on the tennis court. So we are regularly in the position where I am asking her to do some things that don't come naturally to her. We want cold-blooded killers out there."

We want rattlesnakes out there on the court. I think for her that's not something that really comes naturally to her."

Jecminkova said she has seen a difference in herself since making the move from her home in the Czech Republic to K-State her freshman year.

"I think I have changed a lot since I have been here," she said. "I wouldn't really talk a lot. I was always quiet and didn't say much, so I am trying to get involved in more things. But I still hate losing. I am very competitive."

Her tennis game has also changed. As a freshman, she owned a 4-12 overall singles record at the No. 2, No. 3 and No. 4 spots. Last year, Jecminkova and sophomore Petra Sedlmajerova battled each other for the No. 1 spot.

"She has improved a lot overall," Sedlmajerova said. "And she is working really hard. She is going to be the one to lead our team."

Jecminkova said there is a constant battle for the top spot.

"There is competition not only between me and Petra, but between the whole team," she said. "There were four girls last year competing for the top. Competition definitely helps the team. In the way we run practice, when we do drills we score everything, so that's competition right there."

As a sophomore, Jecminkova was the third Wildcat in history to earn a berth to the NCAA Singles Championship in Malibu, California. Even though she lost in the first round, the tournament allowed her to gauge her talent against the best players in the nation.

"There were so many girls there that could really play," she said. "I thought it was a really good experience even though I didn't play that well. I was glad that I got the chance to go."

According to Bietau, Jecminkova is on the right track to get back to the NCAA tournament.

"She has more of an advantage now since she is playing No. 1," he said. "So she will get a few more opportunities to play top people and show that she wants back in the tournament. I think things are in place for her to have a very good year."

"It's a constant struggle when she gets out there. The fact that you are facing the top people all the time is difficult. You don't get the chance to play not as well and still get some wins. Basically, you have to be on all the time. Every match she goes into will be a war."

Despite her laid-back personality and appearance, Bietau said Jecminkova is a strong person inside and out.

"There is a fighter in her," Bietau said. "I think a combination of her athletic ability, the training she's done and her willingness to step up and fight make her successful."

Wildcats must maintain rivalry with KU

With K-State's men's basketball game at Kansas fast approaching, it's expected that anti-Jayhawk comments should increase among the student body.

They haven't.

In fact, I recently overheard someone say he didn't really mind the Jayhawks. They weren't so bad.

Yes, they are bad.

Just remember last year's Sunflower matchup in Bramlage Coliseum when Kansas beat the Cats 94-65. In possibly one the lowest points in K-State basketball history, the chant of "Rock, Chalk, Jayhawk, KU" resounded through Bramlage.

It was ugly.

KU guard Nick Bradford sat on the bench taunting the K-State student body — and the score was so pitiful that the only comeback mustered by the students was "Oh yeah, well you suck."

No, the game sucked.

Remember that moment, all you waffling basketball fans. Never forget that there are plenty of reasons to hate the Jayhawks.

No group of fans lacks class more than those from Kansas. They have undoubtedly the best coach in the Big 12, and last year they just about ran him off. The Jayhawks lost four out of six games at one point last season, and their fans gave Ol' Roy hell.

In fact, the fans were so bad that Williams actually became angry at them, saying, "If you don't want to cheer for us, then keep your big butts at home."

Of course, after Williams declared that he was going to stay in Lawrence, all the fans loved him. Sixteen-thousand fans gathered in Memorial Stadium to cheer for him. The KU men's basketball media guide dedicated an entire page to Williams' decision to stay at Kansas.

The rest of us were trying to figure out why on earth he stayed. I wouldn't have.

As bad as the fans are, their behavior has at times paled in comparison to that of the players.

When I was a child, Washburn coach Bob Chipman used to bring players from his school, KU and K-State to little towns around Kansas for a basketball camp. One year he brought KU center Greg Ostertag to my hometown. A young boy made disparaging remarks towards the big Jayhawk.

Everybody laughed.

Ostertag then made disparaging remarks concerning the boy's mother.

Nobody laughed.

No one underachieves like KU's players. Case in point — center Eric Chenoweth was named a Second Team Freshman All-American three years ago. Last year as a junior, Chenoweth averaged all of 8.6 points per game.

Yes, a 7-foot, 1-inch, 270-pound Playboy Preseason All-American accounted for only 11 percent of his team's offense. That's under-achieving.

But, hey, at least KU recruits scholars for their basketball team. Forward Drew Gooden, for instance, lists his favorite book as "Charlotte's Web."

Impressive. Still, Gooden's choice is better than that of freshman guard Mario Kinsey — "How To Be A Player."

So maybe the Jayhawks aren't a bunch of Einsteins. Maybe their knowledge comes from experience — they're streetwise. Nobody can accuse forward Nick Collison of being stupid. That's why if he could give any advice to youngsters, it would be "Stay away from power lines." I'm serious, check the KU media guide.

Alright, maybe I'm being too hard on the Jayhawks. After all, K-State doesn't have near the tradition as Kansas. No Cat fan will ever experience the pride of looking up in Allen Fieldhouse and seeing that famous banner "Beware of the Phog" (pronounced Pahog).

And no K-State fan will ever get chills from singing the famous KU fight song "I'm A Jayhawk," a song with inspiring lyrics such as "Cause I'm a Jay, Jay, Jay, Jay Jayhawk / With a sis-boom, hip hoorah."

No, nobody in purple will ever be so lucky.

I guess they'll just have to be content with that "Trendiest School in the Nation" title.

K-State to compete against Big 12 rivals this weekend

By LAURA BOYD
Kansas State Collegian

As the K-State track team hits the road for its first away meet of the season on Friday, athletes' hopes are high for success.

In addition to the usual pressure to perform well, the Cats will have a little extra incentive to excel.

The meet Friday brings rivals K-State, Kansas and Missouri together in Columbia, Mo., for a heated Big 12 triad.

However, despite this pressure, the Cats are still confident that they can compete well.

"We are as good a team as anyone," head coach Cliff Rovelto said. "We expect to win."

K-State has competed in the K-State/Kansas/Missouri Triangular for the past 12 years, losing it only twice.

This weekend's meet is slightly unusual in that, unlike the invitational K-State usually attends, Friday's scoring will be based off team points rather than individual points. As a result, Rovelto said many of the team's walk-ons will be in the position to make a considerable difference in the final score.

For instance, freshman pole vaulter Keara Welsh, who placed first in last weekend's meet with a jump of 11-5, will need to at least replicate that performance. Welsh said she has even loftier goals — a jump of 12 feet.

Though Welsh admits she does not know what to expect for her first away meet, she is excited.

"I am learning a lot and having fun," she said. "I don't really know what to expect this weekend."

Junior Thesias Robinson also has high hopes for this weekend. Robinson placed third in the 600m sprint last weekend and was the first leg the 4x400m team that earned the first place mark. Friday, he will go to Columbia running the 400m and hoping for another big win in the relay, but doing so will be more difficult than previous meets.

"It is going to be more competitive this weekend," Robinson said.

A little creativity

Student Web designers explore online self-expression

By JJ DUNCAN

Kansas State Collegian

For Amber Jacobs, there is no reason why designing a Web page should be confusing. The student Web designer has been designing pages for several years, and she's taught the basics to the elderly in her hometown.

Creating Web pages is a time-consuming hobby for Jacobs, sophomore in graphic design. She said she has been building pages since she began to learn html code when she was 14. Though Jacobs' first creation was a simple tribute to her favorite bands, she said she has come a long way in learning how to make an effective page.

"You have to consider what sort of computers and internet connections that the people who will be accessing the site have," she said. "You don't want to create a page that takes forever to load, especially if it's commercial, so you have to think about compression rates and how many pictures you are using. That way, you can end up with a page that looks good and won't slow people down."

Jacobs is just one of many K-State students designing personal and commercial Web pages. Designers of all levels are scattered throughout the student population, creating sites to express ideas or relay information while being able to express creativity.

Artistic expression is one of the aspects that attracts Jerad Cowan, freshman in management information systems, to creating Web pages.

"I like the fact that there are things I can do on my Web page that I don't have the artistic ability to do otherwise," he said. "I can't draw or paint well, but I can be artistic online."

Cowan said he is from Houston, so having a Web page is a convenience for keeping in touch with people he knows. He regularly updates his personal Web page, www.geocities.com/bigcow_2000/, where friends and family can see recent pictures of him and reach him about things going on in his life, he said.

The spread of information on student sites isn't just for friends and family. The fact that the Internet can quickly relay information to many people is what makes it appealing for some.

Richard Maxwell, senior in management information systems, maintains a user-friendly site called K-State Underground where students are able to become members and post events. Writing the code for his site almost completely in html text coding, Maxwell said he became interested in his freshman year at K-State when he saw someone designing a page.

Making the site look good takes many hours, but Maxwell said the time commitment doesn't bother him since it has maintained his interest since it was begun in 1997.

"Since '97, the site has been completely revamped and redesigned about five times, which means rewriting each of the 150 or so pages to give the site a new look," he said. "Over the years I've been doing it, I've probably put close to a couple thousand hours into it."

Some of the more complicated features of the site, as far as programming, include a message system for site members and a comprehensive cross-referenced database on how to make a number of mixed drinks, he said. Finding ideas off other sites has helped in the creation of the site, Maxwell said.

KAREN MIKOLS/Collegian

Amber Jacobs, sophomore in graphic design, designs Web pages in her spare time. The favorite site she designed is "Friends of Forsberg," for a Colorado Avalanche hockey player.

Searching the net for ideas is something familiar to Jacobs as well, who said surfing the Web keeps designers aware of current trends and styles. Jacobs said she searches through harder to find pages that aren't as visible as mainstream sites such as Yahoo! to find fresh ideas. One important aspect of page design is to choose a color scheme, she said.

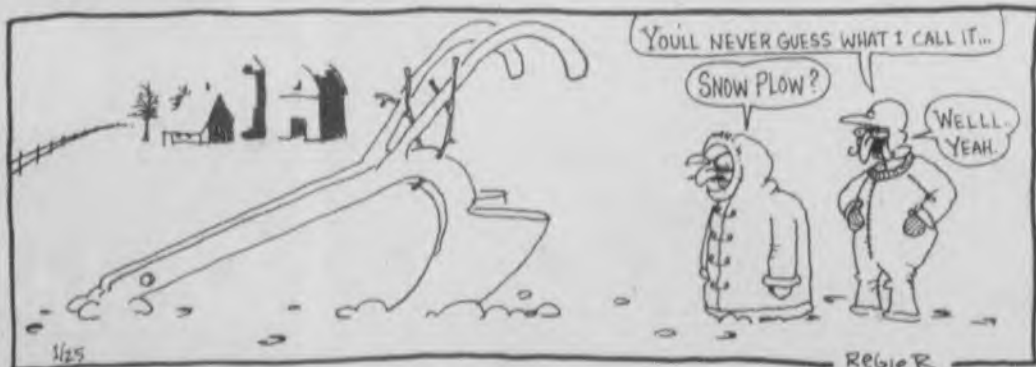

"Bright but tasteful colors can help a page if there's a scheme," she said. "There's a term called 'angry fruit salad' that means what it sounds like.

Some pages use clashing bright pinks and ugly yellows, and stuff that can really turn people off."

Experience gained through designing now will help in future careers for some student Web masters, and Maxwell said the work he puts into his site will help him prove his skill when looking for a job. Maxwell said he already has had a few independently contracted design jobs, and he has aspirations of making a career out of e-commerce.

"When it comes to Web design, you actually have something to look at instead of a program that does everything and gives you a text prompt at the end to let you know it worked. Everything I do, you can see a result right there online, which is an immediate reward for the effort," Maxwell said.

Students try to fulfill New Year's resolutions

By COLLEEN FOOTE
Kansas State Collegian

The month of January might almost be over, but many K-State students are still trying to hold on to their New Year's resolutions.

The most noticeable place to find students dedicated to their New Year's resolutions is at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

"There are definitely a lot more people working-out now," said Megan Brzon, senior in nutrition and exercise science and a fitness consultant in the Wellness Resource Center at the Rec Complex.

"When the new year starts, people come wanting great bodies for spring break."

With the large number of people working out at the Rec Complex, it makes it hard for many students to find machines open and room to work out in, Sarah Brown, junior in elementary education, said.

"It's hard to be dedicated to staying fit when the place is always full," Brown said.

The number of people who work out at the Rec Complex tends to decline after spring break, and many lose interest after only a few weeks, Brzon said.

Some students have dedicated their New Year's resolution to K-State athletics.

"My goal is to make it to every K-State home men's basketball game," Ryan Wilhite, senior in management, said. "I did this because I believe the new coach and the team needs support."

Some K-State seniors made their New Year's goal and resolution to graduate this May.

"After five years at K-State it is time for me to go," Shawn Hickey, senior in management, said. "My only goal this year is to pass all of my final 12 hours of college."

New Year's resolutions are pointless, Justin French, senior in milling science, said.

"I don't believe in resolutions because most people do not stay dedicated to their goals and they usually quit by the end of January," French said. "I think it would be better if people made new goals throughout the year, and perhaps they would better accomplish what they wanted."

14 people arrested for 185,000-gallon diesel spill off Ecuador

By GONZALO SOLANO
The Associated Press

PUERTO BAQUERIZO, Galapagos Islands — The captain and crew of a tanker that spilled at least 185,000 gallons of diesel into this fragile marine environment have been arrested, officials said Wednesday.

Capt. Tarquino Arevalo and his 13 crewmen were detained in Puerto Baquerizo on San Cristobal Island, Ecuadorian merchant marine Vice Adm. Gonzalo Vega said.

"I have requested penalties of prison for the vessel's captain and for the company owners," said Ecuadorian Environment Minister Rodolfo Rendon.

Formal charges have yet to be filed. Authorities said convictions on charges of negligence and crimes against the environment could carry prison sentences of up to two to four years.

The tanker Jessica, which started leaking fuel three days after it ran aground Jan. 16 off San Cristobal Island, spilled the last of its cargo late Tuesday, apparently after pounding surf caused new ruptures in its hull.

Capt. Ramiro Morejon, chief of control and marine monitoring for Galapagos National Park, said the ship ran aground because a signal buoy had been mistaken for a light-house.

The tanker regularly transported diesel and bunker, a heavy fuel used by tour boats, into the Galapagos from the mainland. It carried some 234,000 gallons of fuel when it hit bottom 550 yards off San Cristobal, the easternmost island in the Galapagos archipelago.

An international team of recovery workers had stemmed the leak, but not before some 170,000 gallons escaped into the water. About 50,000 gallons more were unloaded from the ship before spilling. Workers suspended operations and were waiting out rough tides when the ship's remaining cargo — an estimated 15,000 to 20,000 gallons of fuel — spilled out late Tuesday.

How much of an environmental setback the additional spill represented was not immediately clear. Officials scattered dispersants and established a perimeter of floating containment buoys.

"We have taken all precautions to confront this situation," said

Elicier Cruz, director of the Galapagos National Park.

A U.S. Coast Guard team helped recover about 10,000 gallons of fuel from the tanker.

Earlier Tuesday, it had appeared that nature was providing a helping hand for the islands — an ecosystem populated by species found nowhere else in the world and an inspiration for Charles Darwin's theory of evolution.

Authorities said fortuitous winds and strong currents had shifted the direction of the spilled diesel to the northwest, where there are no major islands.

The Galapagos, 600 miles west of the Ecuadorian mainland, is the country's main tourist attraction.

Despite the wind shift, the spill has taken a toll on the chain's unique wildlife.

Oil reached Santa Fe Island, 35 miles west of San Cristobal, the easternmost island in the Galapagos archipelago and home to large colonies of sea lions and marine iguanas.

Rendon said one pelican had died and that the fuel had harmed some 40 other animals, including sea lions, seagulls, blue-footed boobies and albatrosses, which had been rescued and cleaned.

He said that beside the strong currents pushing the fuel out to sea, strong sunshine helped evaporate some of the oil. But, he said, there was evidence that an undetermined quantity of sea urchins and seaweed died on San Cristobal.

One long-term threat is that the escaped fuel will sink to the ocean floor, destroying algae that is vital to the food chain. That could threaten marine iguanas, sharks, birds that feed off fish and other species, officials said.

Ecuador declared a state of emergency Monday to speed up funding for the cleanup.

to break even," Abbott said. "This is necessary because we haven't had any increases, we have to pay more for the present costs and to maintain the lots. There's no cheap system to do these things."

Abbott also said that Parking Services must pay for the new parking lot north of campus.

"We end up playing the devils advocate a lot here, but there are things that need to get done," Abbott said. "We just want everyone to be represented here."

George Wuertz, senior in civil engineering, said he believes Manhattan should still consider other solutions for its parking problems.

"I still think they ought to build a parking garage," Wuertz said.

Thomas Dow, senior in engineering, said he thinks people should be charged parking prices based on the distance from campus.

"People that live a block or two away should pay a lot more to park here," Dow said. "I see them all the time, it takes longer for them to start the car and drive there than it would to walk."

Spanish, said being an RA isn't limited to just the two on-duty weekends a semester.

"Every night, every RA has to be available to the residents," Hayhurst said. "It's not a job that can just stop at the end of the day."

But being an RA isn't just about the troubleshooting or answering the emergency pages, she said.

"People think RAs are there to discipline," Hayhurst said. "That is an aspect, but it's not the most important."

"We are a resource for our residents," she said. "We direct them where to go on campus to get their needs met."

Another facet to an RA's job, Hayhurst said, includes putting on evening programs about safe dating habits, campus and personal security and other issues involving residents.

"We try to educate our students as much as possible," she said. "Programming, both educational and social programming, is very important."

Schehrer said having to be available at all hours has its drawbacks.

"It's hard to distinguish my own personal time," she said. "I have a hard time putting myself up there first sometimes."

But Schehrer said she wouldn't trade her job for any other at this point in time.

"I love my job," she said. "It's the best job in the world. I honestly believe that."

FORUM

Another option is a Bramlage Coliseum park and ride system.

"With this option, students would park at Bramlage and ride the bus into campus," Davis said. "However, at this time this plan is not included in the budget."

Abbott said there are several options at this point in planning.

"If we get a bus system, it will be an expensive investment," he said. "We want to get it right. There will be several options for students to see, not just one. We need their input."

If students are unable to make it to the forum, there will be a second forum at 5:30 p.m. in the Fire Station's large assembly room.

The Thursday forum is the second meeting of its type. Abbott said he was hoping for a larger turnout than the forum in November.

"We will be around longer, which I hope will make us more available to all students," Abbott said. "I hope students make a detour to see what's going and give us an opinion or two. The users or the non-users are the ones who will decide this. Since students are the biggest group, we hope they take a look and let us know what they think."

a forum to allow all who wish to speak and share memories of Wise.

"We want everyone there that wants to go. It's by no means private," Jeff Hempen, junior in open-option, said.

Friends said Wise will be remembered for many things, but mostly as a generous and patient friend.

"Sam was the nicest guy you'd ever meet," Kennis Look, junior in English, said.

"There was never anything he wouldn't do for you."

Graham said Wise made many friends during his time at K-State because he reached out to everyone he met.

"Everybody who knew Sam should feel privileged," Look said.

Homecoming matching to become random

WHAT WILL IT BE?

One of the two proposals would make matches completely random. The second proposal would allow fraternities to choose their matches, and sororities would be matched with fraternities at random.

By NANCY HULL
Kansas State Collegian

The way fraternities and sororities are matched for Homecoming activities will change to a more random process.

Panhellenic Council and Interfraternity Council members voted Monday in favor of changing the current selection process. New options were narrowed down to two possibilities, which Panhellenic and IFC will vote on during meetings within the next week and a half.

One of the two proposals would make matches completely random.

The second proposal would allow fraternities to choose their matches, and sororities would be matched with fraternities at random.

In the past, Homecoming matches consisted of two fraternities and one sorority. Fraternities mutually decided which fraternity they would partner with, and then, every other year, the fraternities bid a sorority or vice versa.

Matt Killingsworth, IFC Homecoming coordinator, said both councils cast the most votes for the second option. Council members had the opportunity to vote for one of the new options or to keep the matching the same, and 65 percent of IFC members voted for the second option.

"I think people saw option B as a stepping stone between the two extremes," Killingsworth said. "In a few years, after people have seen the benefits, we could move to a true random pairing."

He said the proposed options will help eliminate some negative attitudes that result from Homecoming competition.

"We've always been a tight-knit community, so the negativity went against the whole philosophy," Killingsworth said.

Members of IFC and Panhellenic will discuss the two options with their respective houses before IFC gives its final vote Monday, and Panhellenic votes Monday, Feb. 5. There must be a majority vote in both councils for one of the two options.

When the councils meet again to vote, there might be amendments or additions to the final decision, Killingsworth said.

Holly White, president of Alpha Delta Pi, said that while her house had fun with Homecoming the old way, she sees the need for a change, and she thinks the second option will work best.

"I'd rather see frats pair up than having it totally random. That would eliminate frats that have already been together or ones that do not have the best relations," White said.

Very few Greek systems in the country use the bidding system for Homecoming matches, Lindsay Vogel, Panhellenic executive secretary, said. Vogel said she does not think bidding is necessary.

"We have a strong Greek system, so why does it matter who you're with?" she said. "Homecoming needs to focus more on K-State."

James McPherson II feeds his 327 heifers a mixture of oats and hay Wednesday afternoon at his farm outside Zeandale. McPherson said he raises the heifers until they reach about 1,250 lbs, and then sells them to places in New Mexico and Mexico.

Speaking up for agriculture

McPherson was one of 10 delegates named by The Kansas Farm Bureau to participate in the 2001 Corner Post Series leadership program. McPherson owns and operates a farm with 327 heifers and three bulls.

■ Corner Post Series helps farmers become advocates for communities, individuals, develop leadership skills.

By NIKKI KRIEN
Kansas State Collegian

Changing regulations, innovations and influences in the media and government are prompting some Kansas farmers to search for more information.

They not only are searching to gain a better understanding of the factors influencing agriculture, but they also are taking leadership roles.

One of the farmers taking part in a yearlong leadership program is Manhattan resident James McPherson II. He was one of 10 delegates named by the Kansas Farm Bureau to participate in the 2001 Corner Post Series leadership program.

Steve Logback, program coordinator, said the program's goal is to help the participants become better leaders and advocates by teaching them how to individually speak up for agriculture and how to help their communities speak up for agriculture.

McPherson, who's lived on farms most of his life, has 327 head of Holstein replacement heifers outside Manhattan. He said he plans to use most of what he learns through the program for the county and the community. He said he also hopes it will help him in coaching the Riley County Livestock and Dairy Judging Teams, as well as the Dairy and Livestock Quiz Bowl teams.

He and his wife both are K-State graduates and said they view the program as a way to help their community.

"We had great volunteers when we were in 4-H and FFA, and we're trying to give some of that back, and by doing things like this, it will help us give some of that back in a more positive way," McPherson said.

Those interested in the program go through an application process asking them to describe their farm or enterprise, what they're doing now and what they'd like to do in the future for both their private farms and their communities.

Logback said the participants are sponsored partly by KFB, which pays for transportation, lodging and the speakers who address the delegates. There is a one-time fee of $35 paid by the participant or their local Farm Bureau that is not covered by the KFB.

The program will be in five sessions. The first session will start Jan. 29 in Topeka and will address several issues.

Participants will have the opportunity to learn

Murder suspect arrested

By BRYAN SCRIBNER

Police arrested Anthony S. Mitchell on Thursday morning for the second degree murder of Shaun S. Leach, 4-1 Field Artillery, Fort Riley.

Leach died from a gunshot wound to his torso in the Sunday shooting that also injured a K-State Student and a Fort Riley soldier. According to a Riley County Police Department press release, Mitchell, Junction City, was arrested for three counts of attempted murder in the second degree and one count of criminal possession of firearms, in addition to the murder charge.

The shooting occurred at 2:01 a.m. Thursday at the Fraternal Order of the Eagles club, 312 S. Fourth St., James Hawthorne, 4-1 Field Artillery, Fort Riley, and Leach were fired upon in their 1995 Honda. Hawthorne suffered a gun shot wound to his leg.

Isabel Amaya, sophomore in microbiology and Spanish, suffered a gun shot wound to her left arm.

Police officers from the Junction City Police Department, the Riley County Police Department and Fort Riley Criminal Investigation Division made the arrest. Mitchell's bond was set at $400,000.

Sara Krug, senior in parks resource management, offers the opening prayer at the memorial honoring Samuel Lee Wise, a student who died Jan. 16. The memorial was at 4:30 p.m. Thursday in All Faiths Chapel.

Junior's charm remembered by family, friends

By SHANNON MARSHALL
Kansas State Collegian

Sam Wise will be remembered fondly by many. Some will remember the twinkle of his eyes, others the playful nature he had with his friends.

All will remember his smile.

"His gift to me was always a smile," said Sara Krug, senior in parks resource management and a friend of Wise.

Wise's life was ended suddenly Jan. 16, by a self-inflicted gunshot wound. Family and friends still are questioning the reason for his death.

Born Aug. 8, 1979, Wise lived in Satanta, Kan. A junior in parks resource management, he was planning to become a park ranger.

Graveside services were at 2 p.m. Saturday in the Dudley Township Cemetery in Satanta, Kan.

At a memorial service Thursday in K-State's All Faiths Chapel, the focus was not on why Wise ended his life, but how friends and family will remember his life.

Kevin Donnelly, a professor of Wise's, said he will remember Wise as a good student and an even

Kansas Supreme Court hears death penalty appeal

By ERIN DEHN
Kansas State Collegian

Gary Wayne Kleypas, the first man to be issued the death penalty since Kansas reinstated capital punishment in 1994, is appealing that sentence to spare his life — a decision that now is under the jurisdiction of the Kansas Supreme Court.

Kleypas was charged with the 1996 rape and murder of Carrie Williams, a 20-year-old college student in Pittsburg, Kan. At the time, Kleypas was a nursing student living in the same apartment building as Williams.

This was not Kleypas' first deadly act. He served 15 years and was paroled in Missouri for the murder of a 78-year-old woman.

In 1997, a jury found Kleypas guilty of capital murder, attempted rape and aggravated burglary. In 1998, he was sentenced to die.

Mary Tritsch, director of communications for the Attorney General's office in Topeka, said there are seven definitions of capital murder — one being the intentional and premeditated killing of the victim of the following crimes: rape, criminal sodomy and aggravated criminal sodomy.

Tritsch said there are two phases in a capital punishment case. The first is the guilt phase — the initial trial to determine if the alleged is guilty or not. The second phase is the death-penalty phase — when a jury decides if the person is to receive the death penalty.

Attorney General Carla Stovall argued the state's case at a hearing Dec. 6, 2000.

"Our office handles the prosecution of Kleypas," Tritsch said. "The Attorney General herself actually argued the case for Kansas. She believes in capital punishment. She believes it's the ultimate punishment."

If the Kansas Supreme Court affirms the capital punishment decision, Kleypas will die from lethal injection. A decision is scheduled to be released today, though it might take longer.

If the sentence is affirmed, Kleypas

Question of the week

Q: Is there anywhere on campus that I can find out about off-campus housing options and landlord/tenant information in general?

A: Consumer and Tenant Affairs has information on off-campus housing as well as information on landlord and tenant rights and responsibilities. Director Andrew McDonnell can be found in the Office of Student Activities and Services, and more information can be found at www.ksu.edu/osas or www.offcampushousingguide.com.

Free workshop offered to reduce energy costs

The city of Manhattan and the Engineering Extension at K-State are sponsoring a free workshop Saturday to help citizens learn how to effectively reduce energy costs.

The "Cutting Winter Heating Costs" workshop will be from 2 p.m. to 4 p.m. in the City Commission Room at City Hall, 1101 Poyntz Ave.

Local experts will discuss low-cost and no-cost measures that can affect home heating and energy costs. Time is also planned for the discussion of home energy-related topics.

The workshop will be broadcast live on local cable channel 2.

Teen-ager surrenders peacefully in standoff

WICHITA — A standoff Thursday between police and a teen-ager claiming to be armed ended peacefully, almost four hours after it began.

Negotiators talked the 17-year-old male out of his apartment shortly after 10:30 a.m., police said. The standoff forced the evacuation of nearby apartments and an elementary school.

The teen-ager, holed up in an apartment north of downtown Wichita, told police he had weapons and would not be taken alive, according to broadcast reports.

Captain of fuel tanker under medical treatment

PUERTO BAQUERIZO, Galapagos Islands — The captain of a crippled tanker whose admitted "overconfidence" caused the accident that spilled at least 185,000 gallons of fuel off the Galapagos Islands was under medical treatment Thursday for nerves, officials said.

Capt. Tarquino Arevalo, 58, whose tanker, Jessica, ran aground Jan. 16 after he turned off his radar at night and mistook a signal buoy for a lighthouse, was unable to resume answering investigators' questions, said Dr. Franklin Espinosa, a physician at a naval base medical clinic.

"He presented moderate lower back pain and sharp abdominal pains from nervous tension," Espinosa said. "Psychologically, he is not stable, and he required specialized help."

Meanwhile, environmentalists were relieved Thursday over the limited effect of the spill into a marine environment that supports unique animal and bird species and inspired Charles Darwin's theory of evolution.

Only one pelican and two seagulls are known to have died. Still, dozens of other birds and marine animals — sea lions, seagulls, blue-footed boobies and albatrosses — have been affected, Galapagos park officials said.

Bush to establish Office of Faith-Based Action

WASHINGTON, D.C. — When President Bush looks for solutions to America's thorniest social problems, he sees answers in the nation's churches, synagogues and mosques.

He says he wants to unleash "armies of compassion" by letting private and religious charities compete for government money to provide after-school programs, prison ministries and drug treatment.

Bush will begin sending his proposals to Congress next week. As a first step, he and his wife Laura were having dinner Thursday night with Theodore McCarrick, the Catholic archbishop of Washington who was elevated last Sunday by Pope John Paul II to the rank of cardinal.

White House officials acknowledge that Bush's plan is not universally liked. Critics say the programs blur the constitutional lines separating church and state. They also say that religious groups cannot really take the place of government programs.

Bush had an answer. "I'm not calling for government to step back from its responsibilities, but to share in them," Bush said. "We also need what no government can provide — the power of compassion and prayer and love."

Bush plans to establish an Office of Faith-Based Action to oversee the programs and distribute money, and wants each state to do the same. Bush officials have not said who will head the office, which is expected to spend "several billion dollars" over the next 10 years on new funding for programs and tax credits.

Doughnuts might seem to be the reason why LeAnne Lorenz gets up at 5:30 in the morning, but they're not. It's something else.

"The people here are nice," she said. "Plus, I need a job."

Lorenz, sophomore in architecture, makes doughnuts at Kramer Dining Center. She had been a server since last October, but she was offered the new position this semester.

The main difference between the two jobs, Lorenz said, is one less hour of sleep. As a server, she began work at 6:45 a.m. Now, she needs to be at Kramer every Monday, Wednesday and Friday morning by 5:45 a.m.

"I'm not really a morning person, so this is a stretch," Lorenz said. "My parents would never believe I'm doing this."

The hours are early, but Lorenz credits Sarah Adams, dining services manager and employment coordinator, for fitting her work hours into her schedule.

"She's great about it," Lorenz said. "I've never had one problem."

Adams said she enjoys working with the 115 students the dining center employs, and she appreciates the students' attitudes.

"They all have an excellent work ethic and are really happy to be here working together as a team," Adams said. "We all want Kramer to be the best place it can be."

None of the other students are there when Lorenz arrives. She said she doesn't mind a few moments alone to fully wake up before some others come to work around 6:30 a.m.

The first thing Lorenz does each morning is make the dough in the kitchen. She then brings the dough out to the fryer behind the serving area. She spoons the dough into the frying machine. The machine stirs the dough, drops ring-shaped pieces into the hot oil, flips the doughnuts and, when fully baked, drops them onto a platter. Lorenz picks up the hot doughnuts with tongs and places them into the tubs of frosting or sugar.

"The trick is to get them into the tubs while they're hot," she said. "The doughnuts melt the frosting or sugar and get a nice, thick coating."

Frosting flavors include vanilla, chocolate and caramel. Frosted doughnuts are left plain or dipped in multi-colored sprinkles (or just purple for the compulsive Wildcat fan) and placed on serving trays.

Each morning, Lorenz makes approximately 10 trays of 20 doughnuts. The doughnuts usually are finished at breakfast, but if not, they go out for lunch. Lorenz said making the doughnuts can get boring, but she has some fun when other people arrive.

Becky Davidson, freshman in business administration, arrives at 6:30 a.m. to begin setting up for her job as a server. Davidson is fully awake this early in the morning, and she said she likes working the morning shift.

"I feel like I'm getting more done in my day," Davidson said. "I like getting things accomplished early."

She said she also notices a difference in the people she encounters in the morning versus people she sees during the day.

"I think people are nicer in the morning," Davidson said. "They're still half asleep."

Jason Goin, sophomore in park management and conservation, works in the dish room at Kramer.

He gets his breakfast of three freshly baked doughnuts from Lorenz.

Goin said he likes his mornings and, like Davidson, said he feels he gets better use of his day when he's up early.

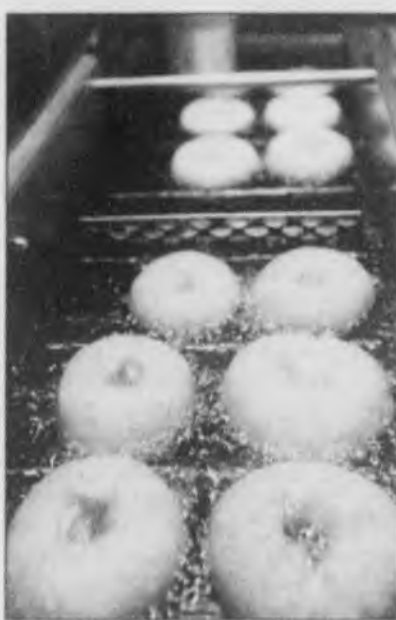

"I'm completely done (with work and classes) by 2:30 p.m.," Goin said. "I get my afternoons and evenings off to do whatever I want."

Students begin arriving for breakfast at 6:45 a.m., and Lorenz begins cleaning up shortly after. She's usually done by 8 or 8:30 a.m., but her day hardly is over. A 17-hour architecture schedule takes up the rest of her time.

Lorenz is prepared for those difficult-to-get-up mornings. She knows what it takes to get herself going.

"I've tried two alarm clocks, but they didn't work," she said. "Now I get a wake-up call. I use every resource I can."

Senate recommends colleges make advisers accountable for actions

By JESSICA PITTS
Kansas State Collegian

Student Senate adopted a resolution to recommend support for advising accountability at Thursday's meeting.

"Advising is top priority for us," Student Body President Jake Worcester said. "After great discussion with the provost and faculty members, we feel confident this will be put into action."

Senate now is demanding that colleges implement procedures to keep advisers, both faculty and professional, accountable for their advising. Senate also is demanding university administrators keep the colleges and departments accountable for overall advising performance.

"Again, we think quality advising is essential to students' success," Worcester said. "We want guidelines set and faculty to be held accountable for inadequate advising and rewarding for quality advising."

Senate also introduced a resolution for support for Advising Bill of Rights.

Under the resolution, Senate urges the university administration and Faculty Senate to adopt the Advising Bill of Rights as minimum standards of advising performance.

In other action, Senate passed final action for statutes amendments in the Elections Spending Regulations.

Included in the final action are updates on presidential campaign spending regulations. Senate eliminated family and faculty contributions to campaigns. Also in the new bill, candidates can use $800 of personal funds, down from $815, but will have an unlimited amount they can raise from student contributions, up from the previous limit set at $3,000.

"We have thought about what is fair and what is not fair," Worcester said. "This creates a balance to prevent wealthy candidates from buying the election, but also lets a candidate with tons of support from students to have unlimited spending."

Lucas Bucl, senator in the College of Business Administration, said he also is in support of the unlimited spending cap on presidential campaigns.

"I feel it will give the candidate more motivation to get out and talk to the students and gain student support," he said.

The bill also raised the maximum amount students may contribute from $15 to $20.

Worcester said candidates still would be able to accept money from family and faculty, but it would have to be used as part of their personal funds.

"We want to make it so every candidate is on an even playing field, and I think this does it," Worcester said.

Parking plans needed before raised prices

Students, faculty and visitors might have to start paying more to park on campus.

The Parking Council met earlier this week and approved notions to raise meter prices, student and faculty parking pass prices, and faculty reserved stall prices.

The next step before prices are increased is the approval of President's Council and the university vice president.

If that happens, the changes will take effect July 1.

Some of the factors for increased parking don't actually relate to the issue — energy and electricity costs.

The prices should not be raised until a better parking situation is planned. It is unfair to ask for more money and then not have those funds assist that department, especially when a problem as serious as parking is concerned.

When we actually get to see the transportation system or a parking garage implemented, then ask us to pay. Until then, it is not fair to raise prices when nothing seems to change.

This is a message to all you smokers — keep your damn cancer sticks to yourself.

I think it's really interesting that Zac Cook is a member of the Men Against Rape Society considering some of the demeaning comments that he made in his column. Specifically the one about the salesperson holding up two fists and saying, "Bigger than these or smaller than these?" Might want to rethink your column, Zac.

My friend Stan wears Jolly Rancher flavored underwear.

I think that before Jon Wefald makes anymore anti-roundabout comments he should go and talk to those at the Civil Engineering Department that have put in hours and hours of research on this topic.

Marry me, crutch boy.

The big lecture hall in Throckmorton reminds me of Brady Bunch hell.

No one in Willard's crying either.

Parking Services is non-profit. Yeah, and so is Carmike Cinemas.

I was just wondering, is it just me or does Roy Williams look a lot like the Church Lady in those new specs?

So whose side is Jake on? Is he slowing down this parking thing or is he trying to push it through? I'm confused.

Did anyone else find it amusing that the article about K-State students drinking zero to five drinks when they party was right next to the super sale for beer and alcohol? Just wondering.

Hey, Michael Noll, since when did wearing Wranglers and cowboy hats become trendy?

Question for Tuesday: What is your solution to the parking problem at K-State?

DUTY BOUND

Current generation should work to make up for past neglect of K-State

At one time the wonderful phrase "hakuna matata," which means "no worries," was the perfect description of a college student's life. The biggest concerns in college used to be skipping class, having sex and drinking.

Today, college students must face the peril of getting to class safely as well as on time, while they are trying to figure out how to solve problems that even their parents haven't had to deal with. The shoot-out at the Fraternal Order of the Eagles Club, which left one dead and two injured — one being a student here at K-State — has made it obvious that the large drunken orgy of college must now wear more than just a Trojan and a smile to protect themselves.

On the brighter side, President George W. Bush has proposed a $1.3 trillion tax cut that will eventually benefit thousands of college students all across the country. However, this windfall will be entirely negated by the rising cost of tuition and the increased price of parking permits. Adding insult to injury, the cost of sending a letter via snail mail is now 34 cents, the price of gasoline is still fluctuating daily and the price of natural gas was drastically increased last month.

Thankfully, these increases are being shadowed by construction projects all across campus. After all, the remodeling of the K-State Student Union was long overdue and Seaton Hall was a disaster just waiting to happen. Despite all of the remodeling and expansions that have taken place thus far, there is still a lot of work that needs to be done. Instead of simply making due with what was on the cutting edge nearly a century ago, every building on campus — from Ahearn Field House to Kedzie Hall to Dickens Hall — needs to be updated to meet the increasing demands and challenges of the new millennium. Even Anderson Hall needs a little tender loving care every once in awhile. Meanwhile, something needs to be done with East Stadium, and Denison Hall simply needs to disappear.

Oddly enough, many of the classrooms aren't in much better condition than the buildings. They are frequently too small and overstocked with wooden desks that are so old they belong in a museum rather than a classroom. Admittedly, there are a few completely remodeled technology classrooms, such as Seaton 63, however, many of the professors really have no clue how to properly operate the high tech equipment and, as a result, the equipment is frequently broken.

Speaking of professors and GTAs, they are still being grossly underpaid despite Gov. Bill Graves recent promise of a pay increase. What's worse is that students still have no way to really complain about a professor who is on tenure, even if the professor teaches about as effectively as a corpse. There also seems to be some sort of advising problem, but that's of little importance since they merely control when we can enroll.

Sadly, things outside the classroom aren't faring much better. For instance, the sidewalks are literally crumbling beneath our feet as we go to and from class. Meanwhile, many of the roads on campus have potholes large enough to lose a Honda in. In addition, the beautiful landscaping that has won our university many notable awards is beginning to show signs of serious neglect. By the way, what would it take to return all of our buildings back to their original limestone color? And what is up with the brown and yellow squares in the Union Plaza?

Once class is finally over for the day, students begin focusing their attention on where they live as much as trying to find ways to put off doing their homework. Those within the greek system have to worry about the occasional flash fires while those living off campus must battle rats and cockroaches as they try to convince their landlord that they are really living in substandard conditions. As for the residence halls, many of them are outdated and fail to reflect the current needs of students. On a side note, several of the halls have elevators that are a combination of roller coaster and playing the lottery.

In addition to everything else, the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex is still open longer than Hale Library and, if you want to use Lafene Health Center, make sure you don't get sick or hurt outside of their business hours.

The one thing all of these problems have in common is the general lack of money and resources to do any drastic improvements after decades of neglect. These problems are by no means unique to our university and are echoed in every college and university throughout the state and most of the country. Sadly, these problems are not simply apart of our generation, but have existed for years with each successive generation simply turning a blind eye as the problems grew.

Rather than spending money on education, many people would rather pay for the expansion of the mall or the construction of a shopping center than see their children be provided with adequate facilities in which to learn what they will need to know in order to become the leaders and decision makers of tomorrow. And although tax cuts provide us with extra money to spend at those brand new shopping centers, these cuts usually cause a reduction in the amount of money spent on education.

I realize that not everyone enjoys going to school, but that's no reason to spend less on a system that is, in effect, training a nation's future leaders. I also realize that we dislike giving money to something we do not necessarily use, but as future leaders, everyone will either benefit or suffer from the decisions we make.

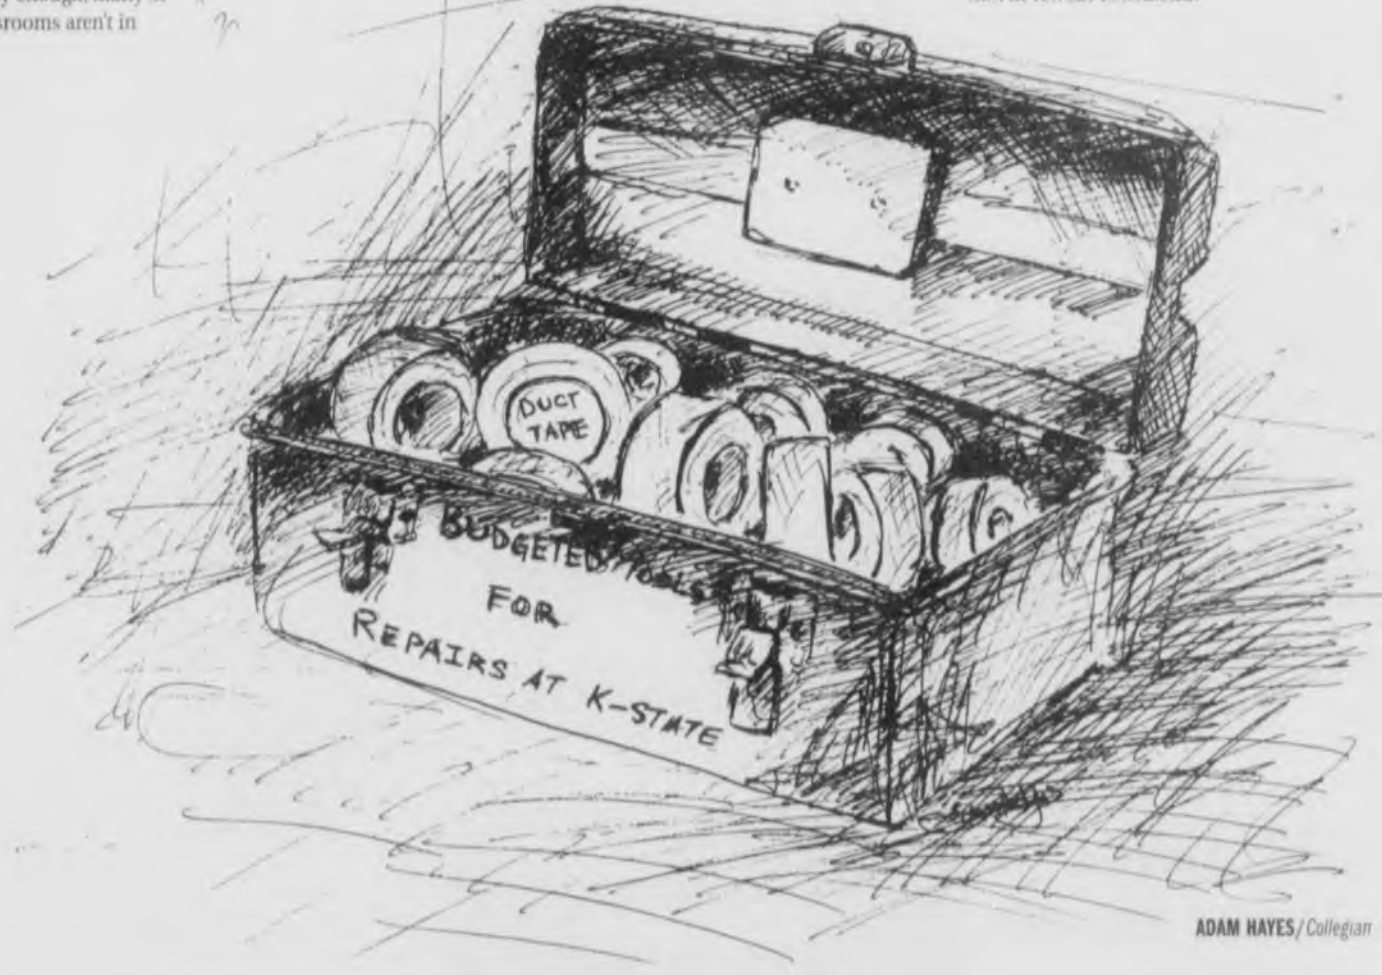

It is our generation's responsibility to stop the cycle of neglect and to readjust our priorities so that we aren't quite as selfish as our parents' and grandparents' generations and ultimately realize that everything we do during our lifetime ultimately leaves a mark upon every generation afterward. Let's make sure it's a mark we are proud of, a mark for the greater good.

Overstressing not viable answer for overachievers

The beginning of a new semester is a scary prospect for any overachiever. For an overachiever, it means time — lots and lots of time.

It is enough to make any true overachiever begin to twitch.

Overachievers are not used to having any sort of extra time. It is rough for us. A new excitement lingers in the air and electrifies us. Things begin, but they begin slowly. So we wait.

Clubs always take a few weeks to get organized and class loads are relatively light. All of a sudden, life looks like a beach, with all of the footprints of chaos from last semester washed clean by the ocean and the sand is perfectly smooth. This is when the false sense of reality sets in.

So the overachievers begin to madly search for anything to fill up their peaceful start to the semester. Why not start volunteering again, join that club you always wanted to be a part of, and how about adding that extra class that sounded so interesting? You are only taking 18 hours anyway.

Suddenly, the first round of tests begin and their daily planners start filling up so fast they have to begin scheduling meetings on Friday and Saturday nights. That once smoothed over beach called life at the beginning of the semester starts to look like a beach after a bus load of kids ran through it.

About midway through the semester you can tell who the overachievers are.

They are the ones with reminders written up and down their arms and on the back of their hands. Often, you can see them briskly walking across campus to the next engagement with a post-it note taped to their forehead, with cryptic backwards writing on it so they can read the reminders in the bathroom mirror.

Sadly, my best friend and I are both the epitome of overachievers.

As we were making dinner the other night, my friend said he found a solution for the likes of us.

He said he wanted to begin a club for overachievers. I quickly piped in and said we should call it Overachievers Anonymous.

At that suggestion he politely laughed and gave me the look I get all too often that says, "You know, no."

After throwing out my cliché club name, he began pitching the purpose of the club to me. He said it should have a list serve only membership. This, he said, would be perfect for any overachiever because it means no meetings. The only requirements for the club would be a mandatory pub-crawl once a month for all members over 21. We both laughed at the idea and pretty much said in unison, "Because we all know overachievers don't have time to keep the Project Wellness numbers up to par."

As we ate dinner and giggled over the prospects, we easily named about 30 people who we both knew could become card-carrying members.

While I am not certain the club is the perfect solution for overachievers, I think my friend has a valid point. There are too many of us out there who take a rucksack of activities and sling them on our backs every semester. It got me thinking. Why are there so many of us who are over-committed? Why is it we feel the need to fill every waking moment of our lives with something productive? Why do we have this compulsion to be involved in everything we can grasp our hands on? The list is long for most of us, from greek life to Residence Hall activities, to the newspaper to student government, to volunteer work to God knows how many other activities.

I have come to believe we do it because it fulfills us. That is, most of us, most of the time. But there are those who are overachievers simply because they have not figured out how to say no.

Overachievers, look at what you do. Do you love it? Do you see each week as an adventure? Or rather as getting through the endless tasks and commitments called life. This is the time when planners begin to fill and you must learn how to say no.

If you are an overachiever and you don't want to be one, don't let others coerce you into being more involved than you want to be. Saying, "no, my load is too heavy," is OK. Know your limits. Don't let feeling bad about not taking an active part in everything on campus drive you into saying "yes" too much. God knows doing stuff you are pleaded and prodded into can be excruciatingly hard to become excited about. So, learn how to say no before it is too late.

As for those who are much like myself, hopelessly addicted to the adrenaline rush of overachievement, keep your eyes open for my friends' new club. More importantly, be careful, take some time to slow down once in a while, and as always, achieve on.

Lafene to require TB tests for some

By LYNN TREVINO
Kansas State Collegian

A policy adopted by Lafene Health Center will require some K-State students to undergo mandatory tuberculosis testing prior to fall enrollment.

In accordance with the Tuberculosis Prevention Program Policy, registration will be blocked for all new and returning international students or students who participate in international travel and remain in a high-risk area for more than four months. The block will not be removed by the Registrar's Office until there is verification by Lafene that TB testing has been completed.

In addition, students must wait six to 12 weeks before they are tested. Carol Kennedy, director of Health Education and Promotion at Lafene, said TB skin tests on newly infected people will not be accurate if administered before this time.

"When they return, students will be allowed to enroll for the semester, but not for the upcoming semester since they have to wait six to 12 weeks before they can be tested," Kennedy said.

Lafene medical director Jay Reppert said there have been five active cases of TB at K-State in the last five years. Reppert said for this reason, and due to recommendations from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, the policy is being implemented.

"We don't want to scare anyone," Kennedy said. "We want to make them aware and give them the opportunity to be treated."

Even though TB testing is only

Students won't need tuberculosis testing if they have traveled to:

Belgium	Norway
Denmark	Sweden
Finland	Switzerland
France	United Kingdom
Germany	Liechtenstein
Greece	American Samoa
Iceland	Australia
Ireland	New Zealand
Italy	Canada
Luxembourg	Jamaica
Malta	Virgin Islands (U.S.)
Monaco	Saint Lucia
Netherlands

required for those K-State students who live in high-risk areas for more than four months, Reppert said anyone who spends time in a high-risk area, or comes into direct contact with TB, be tested.

Heidi Durlinger, sophomore in open-option and a member of K-State's International Community Service Team, said the testing is a good precaution.

"I definitely think testing is a good idea," Durlinger said. "Even though I am only going to be in Mexico for two months, I think I will be tested when I get back anyway. I think any safety precaution you can take is great."

Students can receive TB testing at Lafene for $12. Kennedy said students must keep in mind that testing requires two visits. Medication for treatment of TB can be acquired free through the Kansas Department of Health and Environment.

"TB is curable if it is caught," Reppert said. "Don't be scared of it. It is a disease that can easily be treated and taken care of."

Teen convicted, faces life sentence

By TERRY SPENCER
The Associated Press

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. — A teen-ager who said he accidentally killed a 6-year-old family friend while imitating pro-wrestlers was convicted Thursday of first-degree murder and now faces life in prison without parole.

In three hours of deliberations, the Broward Circuit court jurors accepted the prosecution's contention that 13-year-old Lionel Tate intentionally stomped, punched and kicked Tiffany Eunick, which constituted child abuse.

Under Florida law, the jurors did not have to conclude Lionel meant the girl's July 1999 death to convict him, but only that his actions were intentional and abusive.

Tate faces life without parole, although that could be commuted by the governor after hearing from the prosecutor. The teen does not face the death penalty because he is younger than 16.

Lionel, one of the youngest adult murder defendants in state history, showed no emotion when the verdict was announced, while his mother, Florida Highway Patrol trooper Kathleen Grossett-Tate, lowered her eyes.

No one disputed that the 170-pound Lionel, then 12, beat Tiffany to death July 28, 1999, in the Pembroke Park home he shared with his mother, who was babysitting for the 48-pound girl. Grossett-Tate was asleep at the time.

An autopsy showed Tiffany suffered a fractured skull, lacerated liver, broken rib, internal hemorrhaging and cuts and bruises.

A few days after her death,

Lionel told police that he picked Tiffany up and accidentally hit her head against a table. He later made a videotape with a court-appointed psychologist where he claimed to have accidentally thrown Tiffany into a stair handrail and a wall while trying to throw her onto a sofa.

The defense's own experts conceded that Lionel's story would not have accounted for all of Tiffany's injuries, which one prosecution expert said were comparable to falling from a three-story building.

Joe Leonard watches the Wildcats warm up before taking on Oklahoma last Saturday at Bramlage Coliseum. Leonard is out for the season after injuring his ankle against Missouri.

DOWN, BUT NOT OUT

Leonard's career at K-State ends; spirit still in game

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

Sometimes hard work doesn't pay off as expected.

And for fifth-year senior Joe Leonard, the 2000-01 season didn't exactly go according to plan. After persevering through four years of dedication to Wildcat basketball, all 7-foot-1-inch and 255 pounds of the center's massive frame came crashing to the ground Jan. 16.

With just under five minutes left in the first half against Missouri, the pain could be seen in Leonard's eyes as he reached down and clutched his right foot.

"Basically, I just twisted it, and my toes curled up," Leonard said. "I felt the pop, but it just felt like a sprain — I thought I'd be out for a couple days or something. I got the news the next day."

That news was not positive for the St. Louis, Mo., native.

Tests revealed that Leonard's foot bones were unstable and, in turn, doctors inserted three screws and two pins, leaving him on crutches and non-weight bearing for three months.

His K-State basketball career had come to a premature close.

"It was disappointing for me," Leonard said. "And I'm still kind of disappointed about it, but that's something I'm going to have to get over because I can't really do anything about it."

"That's just the way life is."

Indeed, but Leonard said the timing just couldn't have been more inopportune.

"It's highly disappointing for me because this happened in my senior year," he said. "It could've happened when I was a freshman or sophomore, and I'd still have another year to play."

"At least it was Missouri, though," he said. "At least I got to end it on a good note against my hometown state. But that's about the only positive I can get out of it."

Plus, Leonard's injury hurt the team as well, head coach Jim Wooldridge said, as the Cat squad was reduced to just nine healthy bodies.

"Not only does he provide some minutes for us that are valuable — I think we all saw what he did in the first half of the Missouri game — but we've lost another guy in practice," Wooldridge said of Leonard.

Joe Leonard chats with Quentin Buchanan on the bench after leaving the game against Missouri with an ankle injury.

"We can't cry over spilled milk, but it does affect our team. I think it affects our ability, not only in games, but leading up to games in practice and giving ourselves a chance to get better with a full complement of players."

However, sophomore transfer Matt Siebrandt said the injuries have brought the team closer together.

"Ever since we got down to eight or nine guys, it just seems like we dug down deep and trusted each other," he said. "We got ready to go to war every day together and got each other's back and just played hard."

"And I can notice that we've been playing better ever since."

Nevertheless, Siebrandt said he knows Leonard would give anything to come back and play the rest of the season — or at least this Saturday against Kansas in Allen Fieldhouse.

"That's my roommate — we're like best friends," Siebrandt said. "I feel bad for the guy because I know he wanted to play one more time at KU, but he's going to be there with us, and we're going to try really hard to see if we can get him a win."

At any rate, though, Leonard said he will have fond memories of his career at K-State — especially this season with Wooldridge.

"I've been really fortunate to be in the program this year and see it start to come back to life," Leonard said. "Coach Wooldridge has done a really good job of getting the fans back out. I got to be here

Cats up for Sunflower Showdown

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

It didn't take Jim Wooldridge long to understand the rivalry.

In fact, on March 13, the same day he was named the Wildcats' head basketball coach, he was approached by a booster who let him know just how important K-State/KU was to the state of Kansas.

Now, over 10 months later, Wooldridge's club is set to meet the No. 4 Jayhawks (16-1, 5-0 Big 12), as K-State (8-8, 2-3) travels to Lawrence this weekend for the 247th edition of the Sunflower Showdown.

"It's been a great rivalry over the years — I am well aware of it," Wooldridge said. "These kind of games over the years have been highlight for not only the two schools, but the league and basketball fans across the country watch these kind of games. I know I did growing up."

"These are the kind of games that sure make a difference in college basketball, and they've always made a difference in this league and always made a difference within the state of Kansas."

However, the Hawks have gotten the best of the series most recently, as KU has won 19 straight over the Cats, including six in a row at Allen Fieldhouse. K-State's last win over head coach Roy Williams came in 1994.

"We all have a sense of urgency to get this thing turned around," Wooldridge said of the series.

"Everybody that supports Kansas State and our basketball program would love to see us beat Kansas as soon as possible. And that's the goal of our team and our program and our coaches every time we play them."

"I know the significance of this rivalry, and I know the consequences it has within our state. It's a bragging

Running back to compete for KSU basketball

By MICHAEL NOLL

Rashad Washington, a redshirt freshman running back with the K-State football team, will join the basketball team Wednesday.

The addition of Washington, who as a senior at Southeast High School in Wichita averaged 16 points a game and was an honorable mention All-USA selection by USA Today in both football and basketball, will give the Cats a full practice squad.

Prior to Wednesday, injuries to redshirt freshman Kerry Darting and senior Joe Leonard had reduced the number of healthy bodies to nine. In practice, Washington will take the place of first-year administrative intern Matt Mardis, who had stepped in to give the Cats a 10-man practice squad.

"It's really helping us out a lot. We practice five on five now, we've got enough players," sophomore forward Quentin Buchanan said. "Rashad is a good player. I played against him in high school."

While Washington is practicing with the team, don't expect to see him to see significant playing time for quite a while, head coach Jim Wooldridge said.

"Rashad is strictly, at this point, a player that we're going to use in practice. There was never any promise to Rashad that he was going to get to play any games,"

Women's basketball team prepares to face Kansas

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

Revenge will be on the minds of players and fans at 7 p.m. Saturday when the Kansas Jayhawks come to Manhattan for a rematch of the Sunflower Showdown.

KU (7-10, 1-5) handed K-State (11-6, 1-5) its fourth consecutive Big 12 loss Jan. 13, a 78-67 game that featured a season-high 29 Wildcat turnovers.

Head coach Deb Patterson spoke of streaky play after that game, and the Cats responded with a concentrated focus on ball control that resulted in an upset win four nights later against then-No. 17 Texas. The same focus, junior guard Kristin Rethman said, will be key to a K-State win Saturday evening.

"If we take care of the ball and don't turn it over, we'll be all right," she said.

With the exception of turnovers, the Cats played a strong game in the teams' first matchup this season, keeping Kansas star Jaclyn Johnson to just nine points and five rebounds while outshooting and out rebounding the Jayhawks.

"I think we're a little bit better, and we'll find out just how much better Saturday."

— Deb Patterson

However, Patterson said she believes her team's success in shooting and rebounding were overshadowed by a shoddy defensive performance that failed to limit Kansas' opportunities from the field.

"I wasn't pleased with our overall defensive numbers," she said. "We have to do a better job. Obviously, we've been working real hard this week to do that."

For K-State, that means pressuring the Jayhawks' two threats in the post, Johnson and senior Brooke Reeves, who averages 14.6 points and 7.2 rebounds-per-game coming in to this weekend's match-up.

That task will fall on the shoulders of freshmen Nicole Ohlde and Andrea Armstrong. If K-State's post can shut down the potent KU offense, look for Patterson's hot-shooting tandem of Rethman and senior Kim Woodlee to light it up from three point range.

Rethman, who led the Cats with 22 points and four three pointers in the first contest, said this weekend's matchup is the first step in K-State's goal of completing the Big 12 with a respectable conference record.

"I think we want to try to finish strong, and get our record evened out," she said. "One and five is not where we want to be right now, and it's not where any of us pictured where we would be at this point in time. We want to get back to winning."

Patterson said she expected to see a lot of the same intensity-filled game plan from KU coach Marian Washington this weekend, but added that her team has taken some steps to improve its overall game since the team's first meeting two weeks ago.

"I think we'll see everything we saw the first time out. I really believe it all starts with our ability at the point position to make good decisions," she said. "I think we're a little bit better and we'll find out just how much better Saturday."

GAME

rights game, and that puts a little more pressure on it."

Nevertheless, Wooldridge said he doesn't know how his team will react to playing in front of a sell-out crowd of red and blue in Allen Fieldhouse. After all, four of his nine players making the trip are newcomers to the program and grew up outside the state of Kansas.

"I hope we're not going to be mesmerized by the opponent or the conditions we're going to be playing in, but again, we haven't been in that environment yet. So, we will be tested."

"And I'm not going to sit here and tell you that we're going to do everything right, and everything's going to work out perfect. I'm not saying that. But I am saying that I think our guys are preparing, and as we get over there, we'll see how they do."

Sophomore transfer Matt Siebrandt, a native of Reno, Nev., said he knows of KU's winning streak over the Cats, but more importantly, he said he acknowledges the rivalry that exists.

"When I signed here, I thought about this game because I knew how big Kansas basketball was around this state and around the nation," Siebrandt said. "So, I was looking forward to this since I got here."

Wooldridge knows his experienced veterans will need to step up their leadership as K-State heads to Lawrence.

"I have asked the players on our team that have been to Allen Fieldhouse to help all of us learn what to expect when we get over there," he said. "But until we get there, until the game starts, until the action is taking place, it's hard to say how the new players are going to react."

Sophomore Quentin Buchanan's been there before, and he said he wants the newcomers to treat it as any other game.

"I just tell them it's a big game for the media to write about," he said, "but for us, it's just our next game on the schedule."

But it will no doubt be a tough game, Buchanan said, as Kansas boasts six players who average double figures this season, led by senior Kenny Gregory at 16.7 points per game.

"I think Kenny Gregory is having a marvelous year," Wooldridge said. "You look at someone with his athletic ability, he perhaps could be the best athlete in this league."

Overall, it's just KU offense that's tough to defend, Wooldridge said.

"They are the epitome of an attacking team," he said. "They attack in everything they do, both on the offensive end and defensive end. They put as much pressure on your defense early as any team that I've seen in this country."

"I think they're the best team in the league."

Yet, that doesn't go to say that Wooldridge would trade his players for a Jayhawk-caliber squad.

"I really like my nine guys — I like them," Wooldridge said. "They have fought really hard for their season. I don't worry about what someone else necessarily has."

"We respect competition, and we respect the opponent. And KU and Roy Williams, they do a great job, but I like my guys, and we're going to go over there and compete."

Siebrandt said he isn't intimidated by the Hawks' record or national ranking, either.

"We don't have the superstars they have and stuff, but we've got guys that'll dive on the floor, play hard defense and hustle for every possession," he said. "And I think that's what our team has to be like all year."

For now, Wooldridge is just intent on closing the gap between Wildcat and Jayhawk basketball.

"This rivalry between Kansas State and Kansas has been going on a long, long, long time, and our program has taken a little bit of a dip, but we're not second-class citizens. And we don't perceive ourselves that way."

"We are winners, and we will have winning teams here again. And this could be a great rivalry

Columnist prepares for game this weekend, decides attire

Let's just say I'm caught between a rock and a hard place.

Last Saturday night's escapade with Oklahoma, resulting in a 64-63 overtime loss, left me puzzled, perplexed and downright confused. After all, the jeans (my precious, magical jeans) had failed me. "Was their magic all used up," I muttered to myself after the lurid game.

For those of you who just stopped to give my mug shot a befuddled and nebulous stare, let me clue you in.

Last Friday, I unveiled the magical story of my jeans to students, faculty members and greeters campus-wide. At first, I debated whether to reveal such a seemingly ludicrous assertion, but realized I couldn't hold it inside much longer.

So in case you missed it, here's a quick run-down of the story.

Being a ritualistic "dresser-upper" for K-State athletic events during my tenure as a Collegian sports writer, I decided to open myself up for a change on Jan. 16 and 17 and just wear jeans in covering the men's and women's basketball games. No slacks, tie or anything — just good 'ol jeans.

And it paid off.

Both the men's and women's teams upset ranked opponents, leading me to believe that there was more to my jeans-wearing episode than meets the eye. But just to be sure, I decided to test its powers once more last Saturday at Bramlage Coliseum versus the Sooners, which brings me back to the beginning of this column (just to refresh your memories, I'm bewildered, embarrassed, flustered, stumped, etc.).

All these feelings of torment struck me at once as I watched the Wildcats miss free throw after free throw, while OU stole a victory from K-State and my precious jeans.

I sat stunned after the game as the Sooner players celebrated by piling on top of each other at center court. Maybe my (not so) magical jeans were just a fluke after all, I contemplated.

But just as I was about to give up hope, I got a little extra motivation from one of my fellow journalistic colleagues, and as a result, that frown of despair turned into a smile of hope and anticipation.

After all, it was an overtime game with the Sooners — maybe the jeans' effectiveness grows quite thin after 40 minutes of play. And OU did only lead K-State twice during that period of time, so maybe we were on to something.

My friend's advice: next time, change into a fresh pair of jeans for the overtime period.

Gee, if only I had done that last Saturday, maybe some of those free throws against the Sooners wouldn't have looked like an introductory course to brick-laying 101.

Nevertheless, that all brings me to this weekend's game against Kansas. The Jayhawks are playing some pretty good ball right now — they've won nine straight this season and are looking for their 20th in a row against K-State.

Unfortunately for Roy's boys, however, the Cats seem to play KU a lot tougher in Lawrence than they do in Manhattan. In fact, K-State's 17 career wins at Allen Fieldhouse is the most by any team in the Big 12 Conference.

Plus, in the team's last three meetings in Lawrence, the Hawks have only beaten the Cats by an average of nine points (and believe me, K-State's 87-79 loss last season was a lot closer than the score might indicate).

So, we'll just have to wait and see if K-State uses history as a guide and plays KU tough under the thick "Phog."

As for me, though, it's back to the slacks and tie for this one. I've got a gut feeling that I'd be pushing my jeans-wearing luck on such a high-profile road game. I'm afraid the Lucky Brand dungarees are a Bramlage Coliseum-only commodity.

But then again — just to be sure — it wouldn't hurt to take 'em on a little car ride to Lawrence anyway.

he said. "We have a lot of things that we do both offensively and defensively that he would have to learn prior to ever having the opportunity to see the court."

"But if he's a great learner and continues to progress as an athlete he'll get his chance."

Even if Washington never sees the court in a game, he still will help the team by giving the rest of the guards a break at practice.

"It gives us a little bit more reps, helps us conserve a little bit more energy," junior guard Phineas Atchison said. "As practice goes on, you get real tired, no subs, and it just wears and tears on you. Having another sub is going to help out a lot of things."

While he still is a stranger to K-State's systems, Washington already has impressed his new teammates.

"He's athletic, and he's big and strong, and it will help us just get more prepared, and he's a pretty good basketball player, too," sophomore forward Matt Siebrandt said Thursday. "I was impressed yesterday."

In fact, depending on how quickly he learns the Cats' offense and defense, Washington might see game time sooner than later.

"He's a player," Atchison said. "He's just got to know the offense, and once he gets that done, he'll see some playing time."

this year — I got to see the start of the rebuilding. And hopefully, if I'll just keep building up and up, because it's been such a great year for me.

"Last year was just a struggle to get through, and this year, every day you love to come play basketball."

But that love hasn't diminished with his injury, Leonard said.

"I've been here for a long time so I know a little about the program and what to do. I told coach, from day one when he got here, 'I'll do whatever you need me to do to help the team,' and that's what I'm going to do," he said.

Students inspect proposed bus routes

By JENNIFER L. SHERRY
Kansas State Collegian

Students had the opportunity to voice their opinions about the citywide transit system proposal Thursday at the K-State Student Union.

The open house provided students with information on the cost of the proposal and planned routes for the buses.

"It's about time K-State started discussing a transit system. Public transportation would be so helpful to students," Mo McGrath, junior in marketing, said.

The city of Manhattan and K-State have developed a street-ready plan for a community bus service that includes three main operations. A two-route system crossing the city at perpendicular angles would run every day of the year. The other two routes would only operate during the academic year — August through May — and mainly would focus on students' needs.

"The Bramlage Park and Ride Shuttle was designed to get students to park away from the campus and resolve campus parking problems," Darwin Abbott, director of Parking Services, said.

The Bramlage Coliseum route would run every 10 minutes from 6 a.m. to 6 p.m. Monday through Friday, allowing students to park in the Bramlage lot and ride the bus to class.

The Aggieville Special would run Friday and Saturday nights from 10 p.m. to 2 a.m. It was developed to stop intoxicated people from driving home.

"Drinking and driving in Aggieville is out of control, and I would gladly pay the extra money to make the streets safer," Alicia Myers, junior in life sciences, said.

The total annual amount for the proposal is an estimated $1.49 million.

Funding for the transit system would come from many sources. The plan would require students to pay a $10 transit fee in addition to their semester tuition, which would allow them to ride free with their student identification cards.

Some students at the open house were concerned with the cost of the proposed plan.

"I don't think this plan is in the best interest of the students because it's too expensive. We could utilize this money a lot better if we built parking garages," said Kelly Givens, junior in construction science and management.

If the city of Manhattan becomes federally designated as an urbanized area by the 2000 census, the Federal Transit Administration and the state of Kansas would have to provide funding for the program. The rest of the money would come from a $1 to $2 tax increase for the city of Manhattan and from transit fares. K-State students would be exempt from the transit fare.

Givens, also a Manhattan resident, said she would feel a double blow financially if this proposal is implemented.

"I would have to pay additional tuition charges and increased taxes. I just think that the students of K-State should not be burdened with the cost of a city transit," Givens said.

Student Body President Jake Worcester said he felt the general feedback at the open house was mixed, but that almost everyone was in support of doing something. "The hardest part is getting this started. We want to find a system that's the most efficient with the least amount of cost," Worcester said.

"If the city is willing to commit to their share, I think it's worth giving it a shot."

Ashcroft questioned on discrimination

By FREDERIC J. FROMMER
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — James Hormel, who became the nation's first openly gay ambassador over the objections of then-Sen. John Ashcroft and others, is returning fire in urging the Senate to reject Ashcroft's nomination as attorney general.

"I get no satisfaction from this," Hormel told The Associated Press. "I am extremely disturbed that he was nominated for this very sensitive post, and it concerns me greatly that he might be serving as attorney general, given his stated positions on a variety of issues."

The controversy over the nominee's stand on gay rights widened Thursday, when a health care expert said Ashcroft asked him about his sexual orientation during a 1985 job interview.

Ashcroft at the time was governor of Missouri and the applicant, Paul Offner, was applying for a state job.

"His first question was, 'Do you have the same sexual preference as most men?'" Offner, of Georgetown University, told WTOP radio in Washington Thursday. "I was stunned. He launched right into it."

Offner's story was first reported in Thursday's Washington Post.

Ashcroft told his confirmation hearings that he has not discriminated against gays while serving as governor and senator, and would not consider sexual orientation in hirings at the Justice Department.

Offner said Ashcroft's statement "certainly didn't seem to be true in my case." He said he contacted the Senate Judiciary Committee about the 1985 interview.

Mindy Tucker, the Bush administration's spokeswoman on the Ashcroft nomination, has said Ashcroft does not recall the meeting, nor would he begin an interview with a question about sexual orientation.

Hormel, AFL-CIO President John Sweeney and representatives of civil liberties and women's groups were to participate in a Capitol Hill news conference on Thursday opposing Ashcroft's nomination.

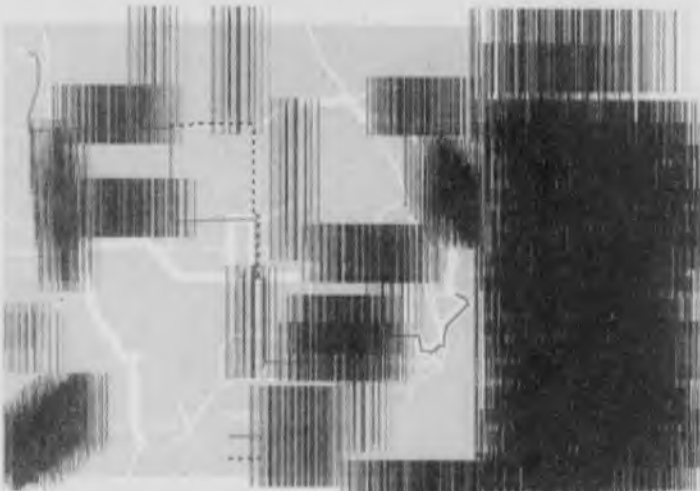

Even his Democratic opponents predict Ashcroft will be confirmed by the Senate, which the Republicans control because of Vice President Dick Cheney's tie-breaking vote as the body's president.

"John has been, without question, through a grueling confirmation process, but I think he's going to win confirmation overwhelmingly," Cheney said Wednesday on Fox News Channel. "It's clear that the opposition is based upon philosophy and ideology, that he clearly has all of the qualifications you'd want in an attorney general and more."

Sen. Thomas Daschle, the Senate Democratic leader, told Bush on Wednesday that he need not worry about the confirmation of any of his Cabinet choices, including Ashcroft, according to White House spokesman Ari Fleischer.

Still, Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee have delayed until next week a vote on the nominee, insisting they need more information on Ashcroft's views, including answers to hundreds of written questions and a complete videotape of Ashcroft's 1999 commencement address at Bob Jones University.

Ashcroft and other conservative senators opposed the 1997 nomination of Hormel to be ambassador to Luxembourg. Although Ashcroft told the Senate Judiciary Committee last week that Hormel's sexual orientation had nothing to do with the decision, Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., cited 1998 news accounts that quoted Ashcroft as objecting to Hormel's "gay lifestyle."

SUPER BOWL SNACKS

Bars, restaurants offer treats for football fans

By JJ DUNCAN

Kansas State Collegian

Besides "Survivor 2" and all the great commercials, area bars know the real reason people look forward to Super Bowl Sunday — alcohol and barbecue.

Chris Downs, employee at Pat's Blue Rib'n Barbecue said it isn't uncommon for the restaurant to get twice as many call-in orders as any other day. With so many customers ordering things such as slabs of spare ribs and barbecue meat by the pound, Downs, junior in hotel restaurant management, said he recommends calling orders in the day before.

A drink special revolving around a Budweiser-sponsored game is expected to please patrons of Scoreboard, DJ Bruce, bar manager of Scoreboard, said. Scores are listed on the back of peel-away game pieces.

Prizes are given to those whose score matches the game score at the end of each quarter.

Door prizes such as an inflatable Miller Lite Super Bowl chair will be given away at Bo Winkle's Sports Bar, Jeremy Murphy, graduate student in business, said.

Murphy said he enjoys the crowd that comes in for the Super Bowl, and he just hopes the game is entertaining, even if his team, the Baltimore Ravens, loses.

"With as hard as the Baltimore defense has been on quarterbacks, I'm hoping to see some big hits," he said.

Bruce said Scoreboard usually fills up on Super Bowl Sunday to watch the game on high definition television, or HDTV. Even on normal football days, when the bar runs as many as nine games, he said avid fans come in to support teams from all over the country.

Anticipation exists to see how the two teams will perform since neither was expected to make it this far. The most interesting part of the Super Bowl comes just from working in a sports bar, Bruce said.

"One of the most fun things about working at Scoreboard is, you can be in another room and know exactly what's going on just from listening to everyone's reactions," he said.

WINGIN' IT

Barbecue has become traditional for Super Bowl Sunday parties all over the country. It's a time for people to get plenty of napkins ready and decide which wings suit their tastes. Here is a short guide to a few of the wings available in Manhattan.

PORTER'S

Porter's chicken wings end up with a spicy flavor between the taste of the wings and the sauce used on them. The taste is well-balanced, without burning out those with weak stomachs, while retaining some heat.

PAT'S BLUE RIB'N BAR-B-QUE

Pat's wings are cooked a little longer and have a unique taste with a definitive style. They aren't too spicy unless you add plenty of tobasco sauce, so anyone can handle these wings. Pat's barbecue sauce on-the-side is a nice complement to the flavor.

LITTLE APPLE BREWING CO.

Have plenty of napkins around when digging into these messy wings. Little Apple's wings have plenty of spice for those who like wings with a zing. Another benefit is that they still taste good after being in the fridge overnight.

Literary magazine to benefit from concert at arts center

By BETSY STVERAK

Kansas State Collegian

Area hands will unite Friday to raise funds for a literary magazine.

The Manhattan Arts Center will be host to a benefit concert to help the publishing of the literary magazine "This is How I Scream." The show will include performances from six entertainers. Saved by Competition, Mo-Sys, Audiodacity, One Step Behind, B-Team and BFD (Brothers From Different Mothers) are among the line up.

Each group or performer will entertain for 30 minutes in support of the magazine. The literary magazine is designed and created by Manhattan High School student Blake Bolan. She generated the idea for the magazine last year, she said.

Bolan motivated her thinking into actions by mentioning the idea to her counselor. She then approached the English department of her high school and began soliciting submissions for the birth of the magazine, she said. After the idea for the magazine came together, the arts center agreed to provide space for the event.

The arts center was a prime choice because she is familiar with the staff, she said. The arts center does a lot of work with non-profit organizations, and she said she felt the magazine would get a great start there.

"I decided to start the magazine because there aren't many ways for high school students to be heard," she said. "I think people need a place to show off their creativity fully."

Bolan said she hopes to see the art center full of people Friday night.

"It's a great way for people to know about the magazine and for musicians to get recognition," she said.

A variety of music is scheduled to bring together a variety of people. With the different sounds from rock to techno, there's something for everybody. Tish Rogers, executive director of the arts center, said she is proud to have the arts center be a part of the show.

"I would like to see more young people in here, so I am thrilled about this show," she said.

Bolan said she hopes the different types of music will draw a diverse audience and hopefully attract attention to the magazine. Aaron Graversen, lead singer of BFD said he is excited to play the show.

"I am definitely interested in anything that's for a good cause," he said. "Anytime a bunch of artists come together for a good show and it's for a good cause, BFD will willingly be a part of that."

4th graders experience parts of Kansas' past at museum

MIKE SHEPHERD/Collegian

Mariatt Elementary fourth-graders Jillian Stauffer, 9; Mindy Converse, 10; and Ahren Haffener, 9, feel the collar of a men's shirt that would have been worn in 1900 while attending a workshop Thursday morning at the Wolf House. Several Manhattan school children visited the museum, which will have an open house Sunday, as part of their Kansas Day activities.

By SHANNON BURKDOLL
Kansas State Collegian

Area fourth graders saw how time has changed the way Kansans live when they visited the Wolf House Museum this week to celebrate Kansas Day.

Members of the Riley County Museum and Manhattan residents volunteered to showcase the house a week before Kansas Day to celebrate Kansas' 140th birthday and teach the children about growing up in the early 1900s.

The Riley County Museum has been showcasing the Wolf House as part of the Kansas Day celebration since 1995.

The Wolf House, 630 Juliette Ave., was built in 1868 as a boarding house. In 1982, Lucile Wolf gave the house to the Riley County Historical Society to be used as a museum. The museum personnel collected items and restored the house typical to the 1900s.

Volunteers were stationed in each room in the house to explain to the children how the room was important to the residents' lifestyles. For example, Laura Poresky, an impersonator from Cow Town, taught the children about fashions in the 1900s and demonstrated how to use a foot-powered sewing machine.

"There are touchy, feely things in each room," Curator Edna Williams said.

Mickey Bogart, Wolf House volunteer and former Manhattan High School history teacher, taught the children about dining etiquette at a table set for a five-course meal and answered questions about other objects in the dining room.

The children learned how to make sponge cake without the modern mixer and how to churn butter in the kitchen. The kitchen has an authentic icebox, wood-burning oven, early telephone and a bucket to carry water.

The volunteers showed how the gentlemen's and women's morning routines differed in the upstairs bedrooms, Williams said.

"It includes shaving, washing and the types of clothes. We have the still shirt collars and cuffs and all that," Williams said. "They talk about boarders and what a boarding house is. In the other room, we show what ladies have to do each morning to get ready. She puts on her shoes, then she puts on her corset to show why she can't put her shoes on. Then they buff their finger nails, and she talks about curling her hair and passes curlers around."

The children saw the effects of Thomas Edison's electrical discovery, held a musical cylinder and learned about different games children would play while in the parlor.

After the tour, the fourth graders wrote letters to the Riley County Museum and Wolf House volunteers after each visit to recall the day and their favorite demonstrations. In many letters, the kids asked about the whereabouts of the sponge cake and other food items in the kitchen and dining room, said Linda Glasgow, Riley County Historical Museum registrar.

The Wolf House Museum invited home-schooled students and families during the afternoons and received an unexpected crowd of 107 people, Glasgow said.

The Kansas Day celebration at the Wolf House Museum will continue throughout the week.

The house will be open to the general public 2-5 p.m. Sunday. In addition to the demonstrations, Dave Zerfas will be singing Kansas songs appropriate to the 1900 era.

"There are so many things to look at in the house," Glasgow said, "and as many times as I have been in there, there is always something new to focus on. I like the endless surprises."

Flint Hills Breadbasket to collect soup donations on Super Bowl Sunday

By ERIN DEHN
Kansas State Collegian

Ask the staff members of the Flint Hills Breadbasket what the Super Bowl means to them, and they will probably say "lots of soup."

That's because Super Bowl Sunday means more than pigskin and entertaining commercials. It's a chance to restock the food supply for Riley County, a county that has a 21.2-percent poverty rate. Saturday will be the kickoff for Souperbowl 2001, a soup-collecting campaign.

"During the first part of the year, with all of the hype on the Super Bowl, there ought to be some way people in need can benefit from it," Shirley Bramhall, director of the Breadbasket, said of the Souperbowl. "And now you can see it across the nation. It's really blossomed."

Bramhall said there will be a lot of children needing nutritious meals.

"We'll take anything every day of the year," she said of collecting food. "Our main focus is soup because of the Super Bowl. It's appropriate because of the cold weather."

Area schools and 89 churches are helping collect items. People are encouraged to take cans of soup to worship services the day of the game. There also will be collection sites at both Dillon Food Stores the day before.

Bramhall said anyone having a Super Bowl party is encouraged to take up a collection.

Much like the football players, the volunteers helping with the Souperbowl are busy with pre-gameday preparations.

Andy DiOrio, philanthropic chair for Lambda Chi Alpha fraternity, said fraternity members have begun distributing fliers, boxes and grocery carts to participating locations.

"This is an event we take pride in," DiOrio said. "We look forward to doing it every year."

The day before the big game, members of Lambda Chi will help collect food. Then, the week following the Super Bowl, fraternity members will load the collected items and deliver them to the Breadbasket.

DiOrio said the fraternity enjoys the Souperbowl because it's a way to help other people and help the community they call home at least nine months out of the year.

Bramhall said the Breadbasket is pleased to have Lambda Chi help with the project.

"They're wonderful," she said. "Absolutely wonderful. They're dedicated."

The spin-off of the Super Bowl began in Riley County in 1994. Bill Kennedy, Riley County attorney, said it began as a challenge between Manhattan and Salina.

"I'm kind of competitive by nature," Kennedy said. "I was concerned we wouldn't raise enough soup to beat Salina, who was doing the same thing."

Due to his dedication to the cause, and for starting the Souperbowl in Riley County, the Breadbasket gave Kennedy the title "coach."

"He's coach for a lot of different reasons," Bramhall said. "He gives us our pep talk, reminding people about the Souperbowl and why we do it."

The first year's Souperbowl yielded between 10,000 and 12,000 cans of soup. Two years ago, Kennedy made a deal with the community that if Manhattan raised 30,000 cans of soup, he would go on the radio and play the violin, an instrument he had begun practicing only two weeks prior to the broadcast. Some members of the Breadbasket staff joined Kennedy in singing.

"It was awful," Kennedy said. The next year, he vowed to stay off the air if the city collected over 50,000 cans of soup. That year, Manhattan met the challenge. Last year, the total number of cans collected was 70,000.

As for a goal this year, Kennedy said the population of Riley County is about 75,000, which is the goal.

"It's amazing," Kennedy said. "People see it going on, and they teach their kids to donate."

Bramhall said for the year 2000, 9,768 different people utilized services at the Breadbasket. That number included elderly, students, disabled people and those living off fixed incomes.

"There is no stereotype," Bramhall said. "We're designed to help people through a rough period of time, and it works."

Jarrod Cooper drives Sarah Bowers and her friend to Manhattan High School on Thursday afternoon as one of his chores.

Cooper plays homemaker as bet

By NANCY FOSTER
Kansas State Collegian

It began with a bet.

Rhonda Bowers, Manhattan resident, was sitting at the dinner table with her family and good friend Jarrod Cooper, K-State strong safety.

Her three kids, ages 10, 12 and 15, told Cooper they didn't think he could do in one day what their mother, a homemaker, did. He thought he could.

So, at 6 a.m., Cooper's morning began. He got up and began the busy day of Bowers'. The first thing he did was make breakfast for the children.

"I woke up at 6 a.m. and had to start making doughnuts," he said.

After making doughnuts, he made cold lunches for the kids to take to school. He ironed Joe Bowers', Rhonda's husband's, pants and took the girls to school.

"It's just hilarious," Bowers said of watching Cooper take over her job. "You should have seen us this morning. We couldn't stop laughing."

The oldest daughter, Ashley, didn't get a cold lunch, though. She got to go out to eat.

"I had to take Ashley out to lunch 'cause she didn't want me to mess up making lunch," he said.

Not getting up and helping him do chores was a chore in itself, Bowers said. She said it was hard to not get up and help him, but that she was having a great time. While he did her duties, she sat and flipped through the TV channels.

"For me to sit and do nothing has been hard," Bowers said.

While she rested, Cooper washed the dishes, cleaned the house, set the table and made brownies. He also cleaned out the refrigerator.

"He's meticulous," she said, laughing and pointing to the refrigerator shelves.

Every shelf was perfectly organized. The beverages were aligned in straight rows and by type of beverage.

"The hard part isn't even here yet," Cooper said. "They all have swimming tonight."

This was said as he was taking

Sarah, the 12-year-old, and her friend to Manhattan High School, where he dropped the friend off and picked up Ashley. After picking up Ashley, they had to go by the house, get changed, grab towels and grab a snack. At 5:45 p.m., he had to pick them up from swimming, take them to the house for his homemade dinner and then take them to ballet.

The challenge was for an entire day, and Cooper said it was anything but easy however, it did have an advantage.

"I get to spend time with them," he said.

He said he was leaving in a couple of weeks to participate in various football camps, so spending the time with them was good.

Although he didn't want to repeat the day, Cooper said stepping into Bowers' shoes just once gave him a newfound respect for Bowers.

"I'm always asking what she does every day," he said. "Now I know, and I won't ask her to do anything again during the daytime."

Students donate to earn cash

■ Donations of plasma can save lives, serve as extra source of income.

By KECIA N. SEYB
Kansas State Collegian

Earning money is as simple as sitting in a reclining chair, making a fist every few minutes and watching a movie on TV twice a week — if one doesn't mind donating plasma.

Chris Nichols, sophomore in biological and agricultural engineering, said he donates plasma at Nabi Biomedical Center as his sole form of income.

Plasma has antibodies that help protect people from hepatitis, rabies, tetanus and chicken pox. It is used to help people who have blood clotting problems or anemia. It also is used to help burn victims. Still, Nichols said he doesn't think about those things when he donates.

"I do it for the money — $45 a week," he said.

Plasmapheresis is a blood donation process in which only the liquid part of the blood, the plasma, is donated. The cellular portion of the blood is separated from the plasma by an automated instrument and then returned to the body. The plasma portion is retained in a sterile collection container.

Nichols said he is entertained for the approximate 45-minute process of plasmapheresis.

"They play really cool movies," he said.

Nabi sells the plasma it receives to companies, one of the largest being Bayer Corporation, which uses it to make marketable medications. Bayer mostly uses it to make injectable immune globulins, said Bill Griner, assistant manager at Nabi Biomedical Center in Manhattan.

Some medications made from plasma are life-saving, he said.

"I think people have the misconception that we're just out here buying plasma," Griner said. "We actually use the products we get to help save lives."

A person can donate twice in a seven-day period because plasma, being about 90 percent water, usually replenishes itself within 24 to 48 hours, he said.

Nabi employees pour a sample of each donor's plasma into a tube and send it to the testing facility in Miami. Once the results come back through the computer and the sample is free of viruses and disease indicators, employees box the liter of plasma and sell it, Griner said.

Jessica Rice, sophomore in elementary education, said she goes to Nabi for the extra cash and the friendly atmosphere.

"I like the people there — they know me for my veins," she said.

Rice said she sometimes has difficulty donating plasma either because her iron level is too low or her vein won't cooperate, making it too difficult for Nabi employees to stick it with a needle.

Despite her occasional vein and iron-level frustrations, Rice said she never is scared of the needles or of being hurt by them. Sometimes she does have bruising on her arm after giving, she said, just like some people get after donating blood.

To increase her iron and protein levels, Rice said she tries

Quick cash breakdowns on plasma donations

■ New donors earn $25 for their first donation and $25 for their second donation within a seven-day period.

■ Typical donors earn $20 for their first donation of the seven-day period and $25 for their second.

■ People who refer a friend earn $10 cash after their friend's second donation.

■ People who refer five friends in the same month earn $50 in referral fees, plus a $25 cash bonus and a T-shirt.

For more information about Nabi Biomedical Centers of donating plasma, go to www.nabi.com.

to eat something substantial before she goes in.

"I go to McDonald's and have a cheeseburger," she said.

Iron level, along with other health regulations, is checked through a screening process that every donor goes through before each donation.

Nabi donors also receive an annual examination, including medical history and a physical exam.

Rice said she donates plasma for others' benefits as well as her own.

"Yeah, you go to get the extra cash, but once you're there, you realize it's helping other people, and it helps you not feel so selfish and greedy," she said. "It's all worth it."

Fed chairman greenlights tax cuts, says U.S. economy slowing down

By MARTIN CRUTSINGER
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan told Congress Thursday that rising estimates of budget surpluses make room for a tax cut. He said the U.S. economy has slowed dramatically, signaling that further Federal Reserve interest rate reductions are on the way.

Greenspan's endorsement of tax cuts provided a significant boost for President Bush's effort to reduce taxes. However, Greenspan would not be drawn into a discussion of whether the 10-year, $1.6 trillion package being put forward by Bush is an appropriate size.

Discussing the current economy, Greenspan said, "As far as we can judge, we have had a ... slowing down, and indeed we are probably very close to zero at this particular moment."

Greenspan did not say the economy was in a recession, often defined as two consecutive quarters of negative growth. He said whether the economy dropped into a recession would be determined by how well consumer confidence holds up during the slowdown.

At the moment, he said, he does not believe "the fabric of consumer confidence" has been shaken enough to bring on a recession.

Wall Street was bolstered by Greenspan's concern about the economy, seeing it as evidence that the Fed will soon cut rates further.

In early afternoon trading, the Dow Jones industrials were up by 113 points.

Greenspan's comments on economic conditions were the first he has made since the Federal Reserve announced a surprise one-half-point cut in interest rates Jan. 3. The remarks revealed the seriousness with which the central bank views the economy's weakening, which began in the last two months of 2000.

Greenspan said "inflation pressures are well contained."

While he refused to answer a direct question over whether the Fed will cut rates again at its meeting next week, his comments about the sharp slowdown and the absence of inflation pressures sent a strong signal that further rate cuts will be forthcoming.

Greenspan, who previously had expressed a preference for using the projected surpluses to pay down the national debt, said he still believes debt reduction is the best use for the added revenue.

But he said government estimates project more than enough surplus funds to pay off the debt and still cut taxes.

"The sequence of upward revisions to the budget surplus projections for several years now has reshaped the choices and opportunities before us," Greenspan said.

"The most recent data significantly raise the probability that sufficient resources will be available to undertake both debt reduction and surplus-lowering policy initiatives," Greenspan said.

3 dead in Tennessee plane crash

By AMY GREEN
The Associated Press

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — Employees of a close-knit electrical contracting company were mourning three co-workers who died in a private plane crash and the company president fought for his life Thursday.

A second small plane crash on Wednesday near Denver killed the founder of an air cargo company and The Wall Street Journal's aerospace editor.

The Tennessee crash came as a King Air twin turboprop plane owned by Nashville's Amprite Electric Co. Inc. took off from Nashville International Airport.

Pilot Michael A. Pickney, the company's president, told the tower of engine trouble and was directed to return for an emergency landing, but the plane crashed in a wooded area 150 yards from the runway, airport spokeswoman Carole Willis said.

Only Pickney, 44, survived. He remained in critical condition Thursday morning with burns over 80 percent of his body.

"This has hit everybody really hard," said employee Chuck

Roberts, who compared the company's 100 workers to a family. "We've got long days ahead."

Police and company officials identified the dead as company treasurer Robert Lowrance Jr., 44, and vice presidents Gary Finney, 43, and Edward Peach, 37.

The company, founded by Pickney's father, Paul, performs commercial electrical work nationwide and recently installed electrical systems at the Tennessee Titans' Adelphia Coliseum, Roberts said.

An investigation into the accident continued Thursday.

THE ADULT FUNNYBONE CLOSSES!!

Manhattan--

You need to know the "rest of the story." Our names are Butch and Debe Knight; we are the proud proprietors of the Adult Funnybone in Garden City, KS, which opened in March 1995. In October 1999 we decided to expand our adult gift store by adding another location in Manhattan, KS.

For 120 days we contacted property owners in Manhattan for retail space to lease for this adult gift store. I can recall seven privately-owned property owners and three corporate-owned property owners, all of which said "NO" to leasing to an "Adult Store."

Manhattan, let me assure you that your city does not have an ordinance forbidding retail sales of adult novelties. We confirmed this ourselves.

We used all available sources to locate a retail space; classified, commercial property managers, realtors and driving the city looking for a location. We even placed our own ad to find retail space—no luck.

Finally, in Feb. 2000 we signed a one-year lease at 2708 Anderson through the leasing agent for that property.

Our new location opened on Feb. 2, 2000. On Feb. 9, the leasing agent contacted us in regard to an eviction notice from this property. The corporation of this property does not approve of an "adult entertainment shop" on its premises. To shorten the story, we received more notices of eviction through June 2000. Our legal counsel defended us well, as we fulfilled our one-year lease. We don't scare easily. Even a brick thrown through the front door in mid-February didn't run us out of town!

Acceptance of the Adult Funnybone by our Manhattan customer base was very receptive. The store was very successful during its short life span.

To the commercial property owners of Manhattan, our adult gift store isn't a distasteful, dirty, immoral, retail business as you imagined and prejudged! We are honest business people operating a perfectly legal and moral retail business. We will be back when we locate a prime location building or land to purchase! And we will build a bigger and better store! "If you build it—they will come." Field of Dreams, Our Dreams!

Thank you to those of you who supported us this year!

better listener.

"I always knew he had something to say in class," he said. "He was easy to talk with, easy to be around."

John Graham, senior in accounting, gave a list of memories he shared with Wise. Among the memories were evenings spent playing pool together at Fast Eddy's and socializing at parties.

"I'll miss watching him at a party, charming each and every person in the room," he said.

The memorial service began with a welcome by Keira Mann, sophomore in English. Mann reminded those in attendance to feel lucky for being recipients of Wise's friendship.

"We must give thanks for being the chosen ones who knew Sam," she said. "It is through our lives and our friendship that Sam can live forever."

Maggie Sebelius, sophomore in pre-professional secondary education, performed "Blest Be the Tie That Binds" on the piano during the service. Sebelius said she always would remember Wise.

"There's no way I'll ever forget Sam. He had the most wonderful, understanding eyes of any person I have ever known," she said.

The service also included scripture readings led by Donnelly and a prayer and benediction led by Rev. Don Fallon, coordinator of religious activities.

Fallon encouraged students to continue in their sharing of memories.

"I think healing comes when you share those feelings," he said. "I think Sam would have been the first to tell us to go back to our studies and continue with our lives. He would be one of the first to say, 'love, be loved and make friends.'"

Krug said she was pleased to see the number of attendees at the memorial service.

"I was really happy that so many people came to show their love for Sam," she said. "Sam was such a giving person. I think of the gift that I have to give to people. Hopefully, this will help us to think of the gift we have to give to others."

"I'm really grateful that I had him in my life every day."

more about the Farm Bureau, influence in the media, the Kansas legislature and other Kansas issues. Sessions will consist of speakers, tours and demonstrations. One day will be spent at the state legislature, and the group will tour WIBW.

There also will be leadership training courses that focus on teamwork and how to better interact with the community.

The third session will be in Manhattan in August. Researchers and leaders at K-State will address the delegates on subjects like value-added products. Tours of the meat safety technology lab and other facilities on campus are being scheduled. There will also be tours in the surrounding areas and updates at the state headquarters.

"I look at most of these classes as the more information I can gather and the more things I go through to help me further my farming, will do nothing more than help me, not only in my farming, but in helping others," McPherson said.

McPherson shares this responsibility with another Riley County farmer who also is taking part in the program. Galen Hofmann, of Leonardville, and McPherson are both on the Riley County Farm Bureau board. McPherson said they are hoping to bring information and experiences back to the board.

"I plan on using what I learn for the betterment of who I work with and help," McPherson said.

will be executed at the Lansing Correctional Facility.

Bill Miskell, Kansas Department of Corrections spokesman, said in a Dec. 6 article in the Kansas City Star that death-penalty appeals nationwide go on for eight to 12 years on average.

Only four men, including Kleypas, have been sentenced to death since the 1994 law. They are in the maximum-security prison in El Dorado.

The last people to be executed in Kansas were George York and James Latham. They were hanged in 1965 for killing a Kansas man.

Oklahoma State staff, 2 players killed in plane crash

By P. SOLOMON BANDA
The Associated Press

BYERS, Colo. — National Transportation Safety Board investigators began their probe Sunday into a plane crash that killed 10 people, including two Oklahoma State basketball players and six staffers and broadcasters associated with the men's team.

The plane crashed in a snowstorm Saturday night while returning from a game in Colorado, officials said.

The plane went down about 40 miles east of Denver after taking off from Jefferson County Airport, Federal Aviation Administration spokesman John Clabes said. The pilot and co-pilot also died.

Wreckage was strewn about a quarter of a mile across a field.

"There's luggage and parts of seats and pieces of clothing. Everything that would be on an airplane was scattered and shattered," police Sgt. Craig Coleman said. "It is very gruesome."

The NTSB team, which is headed up by board member John Hammerschmidt, will be looking for the plane's flight-data recorders, which were not immediately found Saturday.

Oklahoma State players Nate Fleming and Daniel Lawson, sports information employee Will Hancock, Oklahoma State director of basketball operations Pat Noyes, trainer Brian Luinstra, broadcast engineer Kendall Durley, Oklahoma City broadcaster Bill Teggin, pilot Denver Mills and co-pilot Bjorn Falstrom were on board the plane, said Oklahoma State sports information director Steve Buzzard.

Also killed in the crash was student manager Jared Weiberg, the nephew of Big 12 commissioner Kevin Weiberg.

"The players are handling this with each other and obviously are grieving very deeply," Buzzard said.

The Big 12 on Sunday indefinitely postponed Oklahoma State's Tuesday night game at Texas Tech.

The Beechcraft King Air 200 Catpass was one of three planes ferrying team members back from a game in Boulder when it crashed at about 5:35 p.m.

The plane, tail number N81PE was registered to North Bay Charter of Reno, Nev., the FAA said.

Greg Feith of the NTSB, interviewed by KUSA-TV, said the aircraft type "has an outstanding record. This is a solid airplane flying in these conditions if flown correctly."

The downed airliner would be less prone to get above the weather than the other two planes chartered by the team, which were corporate jets, said Gary Johnson, airport manager for Stillwater, Okla.

Mills was a safe and experienced pilot who was familiar with the Beechcraft King Air 200 Catpass he was flying, family friend Judy Bachman said.

"I have flown with Denver before," Bachman said. "He has the reputation of being a very cautious and excellent pilot. He knew that plane like the back of his hand."

She said Mills, an Oklahoma City accountant who also sold and leased aircraft, had piloted aircraft for OSU athletes, including members of the golf and basketball teams, for about five or six years.

Bachman, who answered the telephone at Mills' residence, said his wife, Lindell, was taking the tragedy hard.

K-State athletics respond

Athletics Director Max Ulrick

"Words do not adequately express the sorrow we feel for the victims of the Oklahoma State plane crash. Our hearts go out to the families of the victims, and we want to reach out and share the burden of the loss which the Oklahoma State family is bearing right now. Our prayers are, and will continue to be, with the families of the victims."

Head Men's Basketball Coach Jim Woodbridge

"We are extremely saddened by the Oklahoma State tragedy. I'm sure this is a difficult time for everyone associated with the OSU athletic program and the families of the victims. Everyone in our program wants to express their heart-felt sympathies to all of the grieving members of the Oklahoma State family. Our thoughts and prayers are with the families of the victims."

Wal-Mart plans for center

By AMY MORGAN
Kansas State Collegian

Plans are under way to finalize the development of a Wal-Mart Supercenter in Manhattan.

"I anticipate a rezoning application for the property and development in the future, most likely in March or April," city manager Ron Fehr said. "Wal-Mart has a lease on the current building, but most of the land has been purchased where the Wal-Mart Supercenter will be built."

Fehr said that the development plan starts with a recommendation from the urban area planning board and then would be brought before the city commission for final action. The development plans then would be finalized and submitted for rezoning.

Fehr said the Wal-Mart Supercenter would be located north of Staples.

John Bisio, manager of community affairs for the upper Midwest for Wal-Mart, said the company has been interested in building a Manhattan Supercenter at this lawsuit for about a year.

"We have had good conversations with the city staff for the last couple of weeks," Bisio said. "Dialogue was very insightful, and we hope to meet again in the next several weeks to discuss the development."

The anticipated date of arrival depends on the city's approval of a development plan, Bisio said.

"We would like to get the project under way as soon as possible," Bisio said. "It still hinders on talking with the city and how soon we can come up with a site plan that meets the city's specifications."

"It is the contention that this project is something driven by customers."

"The project will bring increased sales tax and property tax revenue that will help Manhattan," Bisio said. "A lot of people don't take that into consideration."

Bisio said he expects 150 to 300 jobs will be created.

Union executive chef adds flavor, spice to university

By OLENA NIKOLAYENKO
Kansas State Collegian

Jason McGraw, associate director and executive chef for Union Food Service, does not adopt a cookie-cutter approach to his job.

"No day is the same as the next," he said.

Aside from culinary abilities, his job demands excellent management skills. McGraw supervises 140 people and coordinates many activities.

It is no easy task to pull off an event for a few hundred partygoers.

"He is good about getting us all to be team players," Cynthia Wheeler, K-State baker, said.

McGraw landed the position with Union Food Service five months ago. He said he just kept it rolling. Along the way, McGraw tried some different ideas.

McGraw catered for 55 private little rooms at the football field for fans to enjoy both the game and the food.

"It took a major part of my time," he said. "It is like having 55 catering events going at the same time."

Cindie Snyder, marketing and promotion manager for the K-State Student Union, said adding variety to the menu and enhancing food flavors was also on the list of McGraw's contributions to the university.

"We have brought some more upscale gourmet food," he said.

Writing recipes constitutes a vital part of being a chef, and clients get involved in this process.

"I sit down with a client at the table, and we just let our ideas fly," McGraw said. "Then I go to the drawing board in the kitchen, and we make it happen."

While planning an event, computer skills come in handy in the culinary industry.

"We use computer technology, for instance, to track food costs and watch inventory," McGraw said.

Among many others, apricot salad was an idea McGraw said numerous people had had the chance to appreciate. The salad included baby field greens, dehydrated apricots, caramelized walnuts, brie and tangerine vinaigrette.

Unlike other chefs, McGraw does not put the seal of secrecy on his cookbook. Whenever he receives a phone call from a customer with the request for a recipe, he does not hesitate to give it away.

"There are no secrets in my work," he said. "In any case, they are not going to make it exactly the same way."

Such confidence stems from years of Police seek 2nd suspect

By BRYAN SCRIBNER
Kansas State Collegian

Riley County police are searching for another suspect involved in the Jan. 21 shooting that killed a Fort Riley soldier and injured a K-State student.

Police arrested Anthony S. Mitchell, 25, Thursday morning for the second-degree murder of Shaun S. Leach, 4-1 Field Artillery, Fort Riley. Mitchell, of Junction City, was arrested for three counts of attempted murder in the second degree and one count of criminal possession of firearms, in addition to the murder charge.

According to a Riley County Police Department press release, police are investigating Mitchell's departure from a vehicle after the shooting occurred.

He was dropped off from the passenger side of a 1990s black Brougham Cadillac near the 1300 block of Laramie Street.

Capt. Gary R. Grubbs said police are looking for anyone who saw Mitchell exit the vehicle. He said identifying the person who transported Mitchell would enhance their investigative leads.

Grubbs said he could not say if Mitchell was the only shooter. He had no comment on the possibility of additional arrests.

Anyone who saw Mitchell near the 1300 block of Laramie early Jan. 21 has been asked to contact the police department at 537-2112 or Crime Stoppers at 537-7777. The press release identified Mitchell as a tall white male with a medium build. Mitchell was wearing dark pants, an unbuttoned light-colored shirt and a tan-colored hat with possibly a "T" embroidered above the bill.

The shooting occurred at about 2 a.m. in the parking lot of 302 S. Fourth Street. Leach died from a gunshot wound to his torso in the shooting. James Hawthorne, 4-1 Field Artillery, Fort Riley, and Leach were fired upon in their 1995 Honda. Hawthorne suffered a gun shot wound to his leg.

Isabel Amaya, 19, sophomore in microbiology and Spanish, suffered a gunshot wound to her left arm.

Great-great granddaughter keeps Oz author's memory alive in family

KAREN NIKOLS/Collegian

Sarah Baum, sophomore in animal sciences and industry, is the great-great granddaughter of L. Frank Baum, author of the "Wonderful Wizard of Oz" books. Her favorite character is Tin Man.

By CORBIN H. CRABLE
Kansas State Collegian

Nobody knows Dorothy Gale like Sarah Baum.

Baum, sophomore in animal sciences and industry, knows "The Wizard of Oz" all too well. After all, she's the great-great granddaughter of L. Frank Baum, who wrote "The Wonderful Wizard of Oz" in 1900.

The famous tale beginning with a Kansas girl in a strange land has spanned 40 books (the most recent published in 1963), a 1939 film by MGM starring Judy Garland, a 1985 sequel and numerous spinoffs and stage adaptations. L. Frank Baum died in 1919.

Baum said that as a child, she never had to be told of her famous great-great grandfather.

"It's one of those things that I always knew," she said. "It's like someone who knows they're adopted."

She said her family has an active interest in "The Wizard of Oz" and that Baum treasures many of the items of memorabilia her family collects.

"My mom found a ton of the Oz books at a garage sale once, and they were first edition," she said. "I've read the first and second ones in the series, but that was a long time ago."

"We also used to collect statuettes, and I had one of Glinda."

Bill Baum, Sarah Baum's father, said that growing up, the Oz connection was an even larger part of his family.

"It was a huge family thing," he said. "When I was growing up, my mother would read the book to me. Also, when I was growing up, 'The Wizard of Oz' movie would be on TV only once every year, and we'd have my grandparents over to watch it. When we watched it, my grandfather would always have tears well up in his eyes."

"Even before we were married, my wife loved to read the Oz stories, too."

Baum said bringing up her relationship to the famous author always livens up conversations.

"Somebody will say something like, 'It looks like we're not in Kansas anymore,' and I'll tell them my great-great grandfather wrote 'The Wizard of Oz.' Most people don't even make the connection between our last names. Some people don't even know he wrote the book," she said. "People are always so impressed."

Bill Baum, who has given a presentation on "The Wizard of Oz"

Kansas Day
Jan. 29

for an elementary school in Leawood, Kan., said he remembers tales of his great-grandfather as a passionate storyteller.

"L. Frank Baum had four sons, and he loved to tell stories to children," he said. "He was a creative, fun-loving person, and we don't have storytellers like that anymore."

Bill Baum also said his great-grandfather isn't the only writer in the family, and that a love for writing circulates throughout his entire family.

Smokestack to be built at site of gas explosion

HUTCHINSON, Kan. — The downtown site where natural gas exploded, causing a fire that destroyed two businesses, should soon be marked by a 40-foot smokestack.

Kansas Gas Service and Cudd Pressure Control of Elk City, Okla., plan to build the stack over a fire that still burns where Decor Wedding and Party Supplies once stood.

Officials said they'd like to keep the fire lit to burn all the gas that's coming out of the ground. But the fire creates a safety hazard while burning close to the ground, so the smokestack is needed to move the fire higher up.

The stack, which will be held in place by cables or guy wires, also will lessen the chance of the fire getting snuffed out by wind, said Bruce Harris, community relations manager for KGS.

Harris said crews expected the stack to be erected by Sunday evening, despite a winter storm that was forecast for the area.

In the meantime, Harris said, if the fire goes out, it will be reignited to prevent gas from escaping.

Kansas Lottery renewal considered inevitable

TOPEKA — A long life for the Kansas Lottery is a sure bet.

The timing of the votes that will keep the lottery in operation aren't certain, of course. The Legislature could be discussing a lottery bill at the end of April, when members are trying to finish their business for the year.

Also, many legislators still have questions about the lottery's operations, past allegations of employee misconduct, questionable advertising and its contract with the vendor that runs its computerized numbers games.

Some legislators are unhappy with how revenue raised from lottery sales is spent. Some oppose gambling.

But none of those things seriously endanger the lottery's existence. Legislators of both parties concede state government is too addicted to gambling revenues to let the agency die.

"The bottom line is that we're going to renew the lottery," said Sen. David Adkins, R-Leawood, a member of the Senate Ways and Means Committee. "It's $60 million that we're not going to find somewhere else."

The $60 million the lottery is expected to raise during the state's 2002 budget year, which begins July 1, would help pay for the maintenance of prisons and juvenile centers, economic development initiatives, education programs and even water conservation efforts.

Tax revenues aren't expected to grow quite as fast as the demands of legislators, other state officials and interest groups for new spending, particularly on public schools and social services.

Eliminating the lottery as a source of money for some programs would make putting together the next state budget more difficult, even though that budget is likely to exceed $9.1 billion.

"It's going to be hard to walk away from $60 million," said Sen. Mark Gilstrap, D-Kansas City, a member of the Senate Federal and State Affairs Committee, which is considering the lottery's renewal.

Bush to begin focus on religious groups, energy

WASHINGTON, D.C. — After starting his presidency with a focus on the safe topic of education, President Bush this week ventures into more treacherous waters: He is promoting his proposal to turn certain government services over to religious institutions, and pushing the GOP plan to provide prescription drugs to senior citizens.

Both initiatives are sure to spark intense debate as Bush opens his second week in the White House.

The president was to establish a White House office today that would distribute billions of dollars to religious groups and charities over the next 10 years. Bush wants to let such groups compete for taxpayer money to provide after-school programs, prison ministries and drug treatment.

To build support, he will meet throughout the week with leaders of spiritual and charitable groups, and he planned to attend the National Prayer Breakfast on Thursday.

Critics say that shifting government money to churches, synagogues and mosques so they can expand charitable work raises church-state separation questions. Even some churches are wary of government money that might come with strings.

Also today, Bush is to meet with top aides to discuss a long-range national energy policy. Aides said the power crisis in California was certain to be at the center of the discussion among Bush, Vice President Cheney, Treasury Secretary Paul O'Neill, Commerce Secretary Don Evans and Energy Secretary Spencer Abraham.

Privilege Fee Committee to update Forum Hall

By AMY MORGAN
Kansas State Collegian

Using privilege fee funds previously set aside for the student activities center to make Union Forum Hall more handicapped accessible will be discussed at Student Senate's Privilege Fee Committee meeting at 8 p.m. Monday at the Office of Student Activities and Services.

Ryan Walker, privilege fee chair and junior in family studies, and human services, said two key issues were brought to his attention.

The emergency door entrance to Forum Hall for individuals in wheelchairs and the slope of the entrance ramp were concerns, Walker said.

Walker said the meeting is open to all students.

"It is their money, and we want them to have a vote," he said.

Gretchen Holden, director of Disabled Student Services described the problem with Forum Hall's accessibility.

"The existing fire door entrance requires that individuals in wheelchairs must first go into the Union and make a call to the Cats' Den or building manager to unlock the emergency exit, remove the pole from the door and dismantle the alarm system," Holden said.

Holden said many people don't know, especially visitors, where the entrance is or who they contact to open it.

"Then when they get in they can't maneuver, because the ramp is too steep for wheelchair users," Holden said. "The slope is a concrete floor and tips the wheelchair."

Walker said a chair lift by the ticket office in Forum Hall that would raise individuals to the seating level is being considered.

The Privilege Fee Committee would use the funding in a reserve account called the debt reduction and expansion account, set up by the money students pay in privilege fees, to fund the project, Walker said.

"This money is used for emergency requests," Walker said. "Right now, there is about $700,000 in the reserve account."

Walker said the installation of a chair lift would cost about $220,000.

"If we don't foresee any other emergency requests, the additional funding that is remaining in the debt reduction and expansion account will be used to pay off bonds that we have on the library and recreation center early," he said.

"We do have restrictions and keep 5 percent of what is collected in privilege fees in the reserve."

Holden said Forum Hall is a problem and needs to be fixed.

"Forum Hall is minimally accessible, and something needs to be done," Holden said. "This is a public facility and event hall on campus, and many citizens attend as well as K-State students."

Shelter renovation near end

By STEFANIE HOWARD
Kansas State Collegian

The T. Russell Reitz Animal Shelter's renovation, which should be completed Thursday, has excited not only the staff but also the public of Manhattan.

Animal shelter control supervisor Lynn Schumacher said her excitement almost left her speechless. She said the public and city of Manhattan, who made the renovations possible, put a lot of thought into it.

One benefit of the renovation is the shelter's ability to hold more animals.

"We are able to hold the animals longer, giving them a better chance at being adopted. Before the renovation, once we were filled to capacity, we had to euthanize healthy animals," Schumacher said.

The shelter now has 54 dog kennels and 60 cat cages, compared to 20 before renovations.

Having more space to hold healthy animals isn't the only addition to the shelter. A grooming room, euthanasia/surgery room, dangerous dog room, food storage rooms and rooms for sick animals also have been added.

Outside there are separate areas for cats and dogs to be taken out by the public to play with. There is a new room inside the shelter, called the getting-acquainted room, for the public to take a cat or dog they are interested in adopting to play.

In the spring, families interested in adopting a dog will be able to take the dog outside to a family picnic area that will be set up in the rear of the shelter.

Cyndi Stephenson, junior in elementary education and a recent visitor at the shelter, said she was impressed with the improvements.

"The renovation has made a drastic improvement at the shelter," she said. "The shelter has many new things to offer the public, like getting-acquainted rooms. Now, if only the public knew how many cute puppies the shelter has that are in need of a good home."

One problem the shelter has faced in the past is the dumping of pets at the shelter during the middle of the night.

"We would come to work the next day and animals that have been dumped here by their owners have frozen to death, were sick or have been struck by cars," Schumacher said.

Now the shelter has drop-off cages where owners wanting to dump their pets can punch in a code and place their pets. Once the cage has been opened, it can't be reopened by anyone except shelter staff. This keeps pets from running off or becoming injured. The cages are heated, and it keeps the animals safe and in good condition, cutting down on the time it takes to get the animals ready for adoption.

U.S. Senate approves repeal of marriage penalty tax

By CRISTINA JANNEY
Kansas State Collegian

Legislation was passed Friday in the U.S. Senate that would repeal what is known as the federal marriage penalty tax.

A repeal of the tax could mean an average savings of $1,500 a year on a couple's tax bills, according to the office of Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan.

Brownback sponsored a version of the bill in the Senate, and a conference report on a similar bill in the House was passed Friday.

The tax cut would cost about $150 billion over five years and would affect almost 25 million couples.

"The Congress has sent an important message — marriage should not be taxed," Brownback said in a press release Friday that called for President Bush's signature of the bill. "Married couples should not be taxed at a higher rate just because they are married. Parents should be trusted to spend their hard-earned money on their families as they see fit."

The way the marriage penalty tax works is that when a couple gets married their combined incomes push them into higher tax brackets than if they were paying separately.

The tax structure was changed to this system in 1969 because of perceived inequities then between taxes paid by individuals and married couples.

The legislation proposed by Brownback would increase the standard deduction for married couples who file joint tax returns so that it would be equal to twice that of the standard deduction for unmarried individuals. The bill would also widen each tax bracket for married couples to twice that of individuals.

President Bush has promised significant tax cuts, but these tax cuts may not have significant effects on the economy anytime soon, Tracy Turner, K-State professor of economics, said.

"Fiscal policy is not very effective at stopping recessions or business cycles," she said.

Although tax cuts could provide some stimulus to invest and spend, they take time to implement. The monetary policy controlled by the Federal Reserve Bank will more directly affect the current state of the economy.

Fed chairman Alan Greenspan has endorsed moderate tax cuts to deal with the federal government's tax surplus. He has warned against paying the debt too quickly because of the penalties involved in paying off debt before it is due, Turner said.

Brownback said the marriage penalty tax had negative effects on the stability of families and well-being of children.

"Newlyweds face enough challenges without paying punitive damages in the form of the marriage tax. The last thing the federal government should do is penalize the institution that is the foundation of a civil society," he said in a press release.

Laura Estes, junior in elementary education, has been married only about a year.

She said she didn't think the tax weighed heavily in many people's decisions to get married or get divorced.

Estes said she didn't think the old tax system was very fair, but there are reasons for that structure.

"Even if we were two single people, we would still use the same amount of government services," she said. "I would rather pay lower taxes, but I understand why it is how it is."

Homecoming bidding should be eliminated

Last week Panhellenic Council and Interfraternity Council members voted in favor of changing the current Homecoming selection process. The options were narrowed down to two proposals.

The first would be to make matches completely random. The second proposal would allow fraternities to choose their matches, leaving sororities to be matched with fraternities at random. The matches should be completely random for several reasons.

It would help out the smaller greek houses and give them more options.

Another benefit would be the opportunity for everyone to participate.

It also would help Homecoming become less cliquish and help reduce some of the greek stereotypes that are associated with those activities.

However, 65 percent of IFC members voted for the second option, primarily because it is not something completely new or different from what they have done in the past. Previously, Homecoming matches consisted of two fraternities and one sorority. Fraternities would decide another fraternity they would partner with, and then, every other year they would bid a sorority. In alternate years the sororities would bid the fraternity pairings.

Regardless of the outcome, it is nice to see that the IFC and PHC realize that changes need to be made in terms of the Homecoming bidding process.

The Collegian's Campus Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on topics relevant to the publication.

I have a question: why isn't anything on this campus big enough? The parking lots aren't big enough, the Rec's not big enough, the classes aren't big enough, the bars aren't big enough. One in, one out. I'm sick of this. Let's get over it and make things bigger.

I'm one of those people who limits themselves to the amount of money they take to the bars. I limit myself to $75 a night.

I would just like to say thank you so very much to the two boys who stopped to help me push my car when it was stuck in the snow right around Claflin and College Avenue down by Chase Manhattan. Thank you.

If we are using bartenders from Elements of Taste for the Mixmasters this week, what are we going to use next week, the bartender from the Manhattan Municipal Airport?

This is a message to all you non-smokers: I will smoke when I want to and where I want to.

I went out with Cooper on a bet, but nobody puts that in the paper.

To the basketball team: Keep your chins up, guys. Regardless of the final score, you played tough against a nationally ranked team. And to Wooldridge, great job.

Free throws?

I wish the Jayhawk was a real bird so I could kill it, clean it, cook it and feed it to the wolves.

Question for Tuesday: What is your solution to the parking problem at K-State?

Continuing controversy

Ashcroft's faux moderate stance leads to unneeded media storm

Question: What's the scariest part of the Ashcroft confirmation hearings?

Raging liberals who believe Ashcroft is the spawn of Satan might be surprised. By now we know enough about his neoconservative history to assume safely that his agenda is a specific one. We can also see that Ashcroft is a man of action. That is, he has tried to stick to his guns and follow up his fire and brimstone rhetoric as best as possible.

Which is admirable, I suppose. In the current climate of the tropical media jungle, Ashcroft's old-time religion feel, to many, is like a breath of fresh air. And isn't it a relief that the controversy surrounding his nomination involves his personal values and not his personal life? There are no cigars, no Coke cans, no missing tapes. These hearings have been about politics, and it's been a while.

However, it would all be a bit more admirable if Ashcroft, when questioned, portrayed himself as the kind of hardliner he really is. In an attempt to soften his image, the Missouri refugee pulled an Alfred E. Neuman and presented himself as a mild moderate. The result? Democrats are going bananas.

Democrats are loud, and this scene has been no exception. Ashcroft has been interrogated like a war criminal. And while bigotry, misogyny, and religious imperialism are not the qualities in a boy you can take home to meet the folks, they are hardly punishable offenses in a country that reinforces them.

So why is Ashcroft bluffing? Why deny the ideologies that make him so appealing to conservatives? Perhaps it's because owning up to his personal platform would cause less commotion.

Without staunch conservatives, there would be no balance. Men like Ashcroft have always been a part of the political landscape with little fanfare. The consistent reelection of Jessie Helms is a foregone conclusion and generates very little buzz.

So look closer. Ashcroft is no dummy. His legacy speaks for itself, and the starched collar message is loud and clear. The Bob Jones University commencement, the Southern Partisan interview and the Ronnie White incident weren't just a string of merry mixups, silly coincidences exaggerated by his enemies and misinterpreted by the press. They were deliberate acts by a serious right-winger.

By putting on a poker face, however, he creates a bureaucratic and media circus of which he is the star. Democratic McCarthyites want a confession, and until he concedes the charade will continue.

Meanwhile, the rest of President Bush's appointees are breezing through their confirmation hearings as if they were just as routine as gangsta rap shootings. For that matter, Bush himself is getting less ink that his attorney general-designate. So what's happening under the table? Ashcroft might be a jackass, but he's not a criminal and most likely will be appointed. Yet proceedings have been drawn out for an extra week. Perhaps this is just the scenario Bush was hoping to create.

Ted Kennedy and Diane Feinstein have foolishly assumed that Ashcroft is not just mean, but stupid also. By not giving him the benefit of the doubt, Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee might be falling prey to something far craftier than family values and segregation.

Of course John Ashcroft is a villain. But the world is a ghetto, and there are bad guys everywhere. Pointing them out is a waste of time. What's more important is that John Ashcroft is a distraction, and with smoke and mirrors it's the Democratic party that could end up duped.

Honesty, respect needed for pick-up situations

If there is one erroneous thing that post-pubescent males do confidently, (and I mean really confidently, with all the glory and uninhibited gusto of a superhero conquering evil villains), it is using pick-up lines. I am sure that everyone out there can agree that they have heard, or used, some "doosies" in their day. Upon examination, it is nearly astounding to consider what great lengths the brain will go to, almost literally shutting itself off and letting the mouth take over, in order to "woo" the opposite sex.

Consider the way that expressing interest in someone has evolved throughout your life span. In grade school, it was as simple as offering to share half of your Twinkie and playing footsie under the lunch table.

In junior high, an expression of true love was as straightforward as calling the object of your desire things like, "ugly," or "stupid" in front of their friends.

Then, in high school we progressed to the point of phone calls and locker notes, actually talking to our points of interest.

And now, here we are, in college, at the peak of sexual and relationship desire, retreating to intimacy's most misconstrued notion of a good idea, the pick-up line.

It seems as though the older I get, the better (or perhaps worse?) the pick-up lines become. Ladies, picture this situation: A hot dance club, dim lights, loud music. You catch his eye from across the room. He watches you as you dance and talk with your friends. You make eye contact; he smiles. Your mind begins racing with infinite possibilities...

What is his name? Does he go to school here? Does he have a girlfriend? Does he like me? Would my parents like him? Would he be a suitable future father for my to-be-conceived children?

And while your mind is considering all of the wondrous fantasies, he begins to make his way across the dance floor, sauntering straight up to you ... a superhero on a valiant mission. And once he reaches you, he looks deeply into your eyes, clasps your hand in his, leans down and whispers the words you have been waiting all night to hear.

"I have a van outside — you wanna see the backseat?"

No, no, no, no, no. C'mon now, think. Maybe, just maybe, the answer would have been "yes" before, but after such an unabashed act of stupidity, she will have to say no. Heed this warning, men: never jump the gun on your sexual intentions without first introducing yourself. It's really easy, I promise. Consider these catchy phrases instead, "Hi my name is..." or "What's your name?" See how simple it is?

For those of you who are still confused by the difference between a good way to approach someone and a bad way, here are some examples that I have witnessed to be utterly unsuccessful.

"I have been looking down your shirt all night," or "Hey, do ya wanna fool around?" Or, my personal favorite (in light of the conquest-prone nature of a true superhero), "Do you wanna see my Batcave, Robin?"

Naturally, there are many, many, many more existing examples of lines that just won't work. So tread cautiously and stay with what is considered safe: respect, honesty and a genuine expression of interest in something beyond a one-night stand.

Imagine yourself back at the grade school lunch table again. And while you may not have a Twinkie to offer her, share with her something as equally substantial — a piece of yourself.

After all, she is not really interested in being swept off her feet. Chances are, she really just wants to get to know you. That's why she sat down at your lunch table in the first place.

So use this information, and get out there next weekend. Show the world what you can really do if you just keep your brain turned on. Go to parties, make eye contact, make real conversation and make something happen. Hopefully then you won't be returning to the Batcave all alone.

Ravens celebrate Super Bowl win over Giants

By EDDIE PELLIS
The Associated Press

TAMPA, Fla. — The Baltimore Ravens brought brutal efficiency, unbending defense and a dose of explosive excitement to the Super Bowl, putting their own distinctive stamp on America's great football celebration.

The Ravens defeated the New York Giants 34-7 Sunday to bring pro-football's championship back to Baltimore for the first time since 1971.

With the Giants' only score coming on a kickoff return, Ravens linebacker Ray Lewis and his defense became part of Super Bowl lore by not allowing a touchdown. Teammate Jermaine Lewis joined them with an 84-yard kickoff return that stifled New York's only glimmer of hope.

The defense made the Giants look helpless, chasing quarterback Kerry Collins all over the field. It also proved it can do more than just stop people. Duane Starks had a 49-yard interception return late in the third quarter to give the Ravens a 17-0 lead.

Ron Dixon followed with a 97-yard kickoff return for a touchdown and New York's only points. But Lewis answered with his own score, and the Giants were stuck with the same 17-point hole.

Except for that brief flurry, this probably didn't come off as the most entertaining football, especially to the casual fan who might watch the Super Bowl and no other game each year.

Both the Ravens and Giants came in as defensive-minded, plodding teams, whose most notable players were a recovering alcoholic and a linebacker who stood trial for murder.

Both spent the week explaining their styles — not as entertainers, but as purveyors of great defense and grind-it-out football.

"I'm not a huge baseball fan, but a 2-1 game is, I guess, an exciting game," Ravens coach Brian Billick said before the game. "The No. 1 criticism that you hear of this game is, it tends to be a blowout."

This one fit the blowout mold and failed to live up to some of the title games of the recent past. Last season, the St. Louis Rams made a tackle on the 1-yard line on the final play to preserve a 23-16 win over the Tennessee Titans. In 1998, John Elway and the Denver Broncos got their first title with a heartstopping 31-24 victory over Green Bay.

The most interesting stuff might have come before the game. Woven through the week of buildup were tales of retribution and atonement, bold statements and second chances — in short, it was the NFL at its best and worst.

Headlining the drama was the story of Lewis, who was outside an Atlanta night club after last year's Super Bowl when two people were stabbed to death.

Lewis was charged with murder, but he eventually pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor charge of obstructing justice. He has dealt with these questions all season and this was his chance, on the grand stage, to apologize to the victims' families or show some remorse for what happened.

"I'm not here to try to justify anything that went on because that's a story in my book that's closed," said Lewis, the NFL defensive player of the year.

More willing to talk was Collins, a recovering alcoholic who has overcome his problems to play in the Super Bowl.

"I think I'm a better success story off the field because the things I've done off the field have transcended into my professional life," Collins said.

But Collins fell short, throwing four interceptions against a Ravens defense that suffocated the Giants at every point.

His counterpart, Trent Dilfer, once played for the Tampa Bay Buccaneers in the same stadium where he won the Super Bowl. He was a disappointment in Tampa but left this time in a much different light.

"I think you get beat down enough that you pick yourself back up and realize you really don't have anything to fear," Dilfer said.

He threw the only touchdown pass of the game, a 38-yard strike to Brandon Stokley that gave the Ravens a 7-0 lead in the first quarter.

Baltimore needed little else, as the Ravens improved to 16-0 this season when their offense scored more than seven points.

The Super Bowl returned to Tampa for the first time since the Giants beat the Buffalo Bills in 1991, when the Gulf War was raging and security was high.

Elsewhere, the game took on different meanings.

In California, fans were urged to watch in large groups to prevent power outages in a state dealing with an energy crisis.

At casinos in Nevada, where some $70 million will be legally wagered, the most intriguing bet was on whether the teams would combine to score more or less than 33 points. The over-under point total set by oddsmakers was the lowest in Super Bowl history, a sign of the expected defensive nature of the game.

Men lose to intrastate rival KU 92-66; player says not step back for K-State

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

The final score at Allen Fieldhouse on Saturday seemed to indicate that not much has changed in the past year of K-State basketball.

But that assumption would be wrong.

Kansas might have jumped to a 25-10 lead to start the game, might have led 53-36 at halftime and might have won the contest 92-66, but this wasn't the same type of Cat squad the Jayhawks have been dominating the past eight years.

"They seemed like they had a little bit more confidence than they've had in the past. They didn't seem afraid even though we did beat them by a large margin," KU forward Kenny Gregory said. "It seemed like in the past, they would really give in early. Last year, I think we were up by, like, 30 at halftime."

"They never fought back in the second half at all."

"Today, even though we did get the lead, they fought back, so I think that's a good sign that their coach is doing a real good job with them, and they're buying in to what he's teaching them."

So, even though the final score was reminiscent of the Cats' previous 19 losses at the hands of the Jayhawks, the game wasn't at all a step back for K-State's program, guard Phineas Atchison said.

"We're making very good progress. From the beginning of the year until now, we've come 10 notches," he said.

Unfortunately for K-State (8-9, 2-4), that improvement wasn't enough to hang with the likes of No. 4 Kansas (17-1, 6-0), head coach Jim Wooldridge said.

"We played a very good team today. We had to do a lot of things at a very great level to beat these guys, and we just didn't do that," he said.

The game wasn't a total wash for the Cats, though.

Atchison scored a season-high 28 points, 19 of which came in the first half. In the paint, forward Travis Reynolds scored 10 points and grabbed a career-high 16 rebounds.

"I thought Travis Reynolds played an exceptional game in both halves tonight," Wooldridge said, "and was really our spirit. He tried to keep our guys going all night long."

Reynolds was the lone bright spot inside, however, as the Cats' three other post players combined for just 11 points and two rebounds.

"Travis Reynolds was our inside guy tonight. Let's face it. He was our rebounder. He was our scorer in there," Wooldridge said.

"Everybody's got to play their absolute best for our team to be competitive against this type of competition, and tonight Travis did. We need others. I'm not saying any of our guys didn't try. I'm not saying they didn't give the effort, but you've got to do certain things against these people."

What K-State was unable to do was stop the Jayhawks' offensive machine.

All five Kansas starters scored in double digits, and many times, the Jayhawks just flat out beat the Cats down the floor.

"If you don't get back down the floor against this team, you're not going to beat them," Wooldridge said. "We really did a poor job in defensive transition in playing together."

"We have a format that we play out of in that part of the game, and we didn't execute that."

"That led to layups, which opened the floodgates and gave them, not that they need any confidence, but it led to giving them more confidence that we can do what we want with this defense."

Offensively, the Cats' four junior college transfers found out first hand just how good KU plays defense.

"Coming out, I didn't think the defense would really be like that," point guard Larry Reid said.

"They forced us into all kinds of turnovers, and got us out of whack on offense, so that was the thing I was most impressed with."

K-State's offense might have been out of whack, but it wasn't completely broken.

Several times, in both halves, the Cats managed to claw back from large deficits.

In fact, with just under 10 minutes left in the game, K-State had fought to be within 12 points after trailing by 17 points four minutes earlier.

"When we made that run in the second half, we got it down to 12, I thought it was destined for us to come back," Reynolds said.

Kansas, however, quickly would end the Cats' dreams of a come-from-behind upset.

The Hawks rattled off six points on three layups in one minute to put the game out of reach for good.

"We made that run, they answered. That's what good teams do," Reynolds said.

"We made a little run on them, and they made that run, and after that, it was over."

The game might have been over, and the score might have been ugly, but it still wasn't a step back, Reynolds said.

"It's not a step backwards. We know we didn't come out and play the way we know we can play, but the good thing about it — we're right back at it on Tuesday," he said, "so we've got two days of practice to get ready for Nebraska on Tuesday."

MATT STAMEY/Collegian

Larry Reid goes up past KU's Nick Collison for two of his nine points in Saturday's 92-66 loss. K-State shot 42.9 percent from the floor and pulled down 40 rebounds, 27 of which were defensive.

Community college transfer makes transition from starter to coming off bench

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

Phineas Atchison isn't used to a reserve role.

The junior transfer was a two-year starter at Central Florida Community College and started three years for the Comets of Greenville (Ill.) High School.

So when K-State head coach Jim Wooldridge asked Atchison to come off the bench after starting the first six games, the 6-foot-1 guard had a transition to make.

And it seems he's made it quite nicely.

Atchison came off the bench against Kansas on Saturday afternoon to light up the Cat offense with 28 points on 10 of 19 shooting, including three of six from three-point range.

"I just think it came to me. I wasn't expecting to hit that many shots — I was just playing the rhythm."

Quite a rhythm he had, especially in the first half, as the junior drilled eight of 12 field goal attempts for 19 points through the first 20 minutes of action.

Even the KU players were surprised. Jayhawk guard Jeff Bosch said, although Atchison came in leading the Cats in scoring at a 12.9 points-per-game clip.

"Me and Kenny Gregory were sitting on the bench, and we looked up and he had 19 points," Bosch said. "But he's a good player. He's got a good stroke, and he's able to take the ball to the basket and pull up, too."

In fact, that combination of Atchison's inside/outside game enabled K-State to stay in the ball game, Cat guard Larry Reid said.

"He really helped us out coming off the bench — you don't really expect that from a guy — but he came out and scored some buckets that we really needed," Reid said.

Nevertheless, Wooldridge said he can't quite tell when Atchison is feeling his rhythm. He just lets him find out for himself.

"I can't, but I know he wants to shoot it," Wooldridge said. "It doesn't rattle him to miss a shot, and he's pretty confident in his abilities to make plays and make shots."

Apparently so. Atchison's 28 points were the most scored by a player on KU through all 18 games this season, and the second-most scored by a Wildcat player this year, behind Reid's 31-point outburst against Iowa on Dec. 23.

At any rate, Atchison isn't sure whether he's more productive as a reserve player.

After all, he said he once scored 44 points as a starter during his senior year of high school.

"I don't know — it seems to be that way," he said. "It really doesn't matter to me if I come off the bench or not. Once I get in the game I've just got to do the same things that I'd do if I was starting."

Women lose by 3; KU leads most of game

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

Experience didn't wear a jersey Saturday night in Bramlage Coliseum, but by the end of the 81st Sunflower Showdown, it was clear that it was working for the Kansas Jayhawks and not for the Wildcats.

In front of the second-largest crowd ever to see a women's basketball game in K-State (11-7, 1-6) history, 9,127, rivalry reared its fierce head for the second time this season, and the Jayhawks (8-10, 2-5) came out on top, 65-62.

"It's disappointing," K-State head coach Deb Patterson said after the team's second heart-breaker in two games.

"I think our team is playing extremely hard. I think they're just not quite solid enough with their experience to be able to sustain the discipline, and the focus and the confidence down the stretch."

Freshman Nicole Ohlde's 21 points and five rebounds weren't enough down the stretch, and Brooke Reve's block of an Ohlde three-point attempt with time running out sealed Kansas' second conference win of the year, both against the Wildcats.

After two Ohlde free throws with 16:14 to play in the first half gave K-State its first and only lead of the game, the climate on K-State's side of the floor turned cooler than the Manhattan weather outside Bramlage, as Patterson saw her team miss its next 11 shots from the field. KU's Reve hit three shots during that stretch, leading the Jayhawks on a 10-0 run, while the Cats went scoreless for more than nine minutes.

Patterson attributed that lull, along with others in the game, to a lack of experience on the part of K-State and KU's tough post game.

"There were big segments of the game when we needed somebody to understand what was the next big play to be made, and we just couldn't find it," she said. "That's the nature of coaching young players."

After limiting star Jayhawk Jaclyn Johnson to just nine points and five rebounds in Lawrence just two weeks ago, K-State couldn't come up with the right defensive package to contain the senior in Saturday's rematch.

"I didn't think we did the same caliber of job in the post, and I credit Jaclyn a lot with that," Patterson said. "We identified early on in the game that she was going to take that team on her shoulders. She was playing extremely aggressive and strong, and she stepped up and played a very good game."

K-State needed more defensive output than what freshmen Ohlde, Andrea Armstrong and Danielle Hutton could muster in a game that was more physical in the post than the two teams' previous matchup. The KU combination of seniors Reve and Johnson combined for 32 points, 14 rebounds and three blocks in their final regular-season contest against K-State.

"They came out really aggressive," Ohlde said. "They were really physical."

But Kansas' increased aggressiveness was felt even more when K-State had the ball. Senior Jennifer Jackson said her team's defensive focus coming into the game was simple.

"We didn't want them to get the three so we started switching on screens and really cut down on Kim Woodlee and Kristin Rethman because we knew they were their best shooters," she said.

Woodlee and Rethman combined for just 11 points, but senior guard April Sailors picked up the slack of her perimeter teammates, connecting on three of four attempts from long range to finish with 11 points.

Another unlikely star, redshirt freshman Hutton, came up big for the Cats on Saturday as well. Hutton's pair of baskets late in the first half sparked a 9-2 drive that allowed K-State to cut the lead to six going into halftime.

Hutton added nine points and four rebounds in the second half to keep the game within reach, but execution, she said, was what kept this team from getting over the hump against Kansas.

"It was us not getting boards where we needed them and execution on offense," she said. "I think they were smarter. At different times we got lazy in different aspects of our defense."

Sugar & Spice

Stereotypes, lack of plot manage to alienate adult audiences

When in doubt, play up stereotypes for all they're worth.

Such is the situation with "Sugar and Spice," the story of a cheerleader, Diane Weston (Marley Shelton, "Never Been Kissed") who becomes pregnant with the child of her high school's star quarterback (James Marsden, "X-Men"). As a pregnant teen, what else can Diane do but rob a bank with her friends as her partners in crime? And as Betty Dols, no less.

The movie relies heavily on tasteless stereotypes to induce even the slightest giggle from audiences: there's the ditz, blond-haired, blue-eyed girl; the dumb jock; the rebel (Shame on you,

"SUGAR AND SPICE"

Mena Suvari); the stalker; the brain, the wishy-washy Christian and the gay yell leader. Could these characters be any more overdone?

Although the film probably is aimed at an audience of pre-pubescent girls, the toilet humor in the film is enough to make Tom Green roll his eyes in disgust.

And not since "Clueless" or "Beverly Hills 90210" have we seen 17-year-olds played by people old enough to have already attended their 10-year high school reunion (Marsden is 27, while Shelton is 26). Come on, Are Generation-X actors that hard up for roles that they have to revert to their high school days to get jobs in film? There are plenty of other actors and actresses fit to portray such trivial and simplistic roles.

If you're looking for a legal way to kill the ol' brain cells, this is the movie for you. Otherwise, if being surrounded by hordes of giggling, hyperactive 12-year-olds strung out on sugar doesn't sound like a good way to spend your evening (and I'd have to agree with you), don't set yourself up for disappointment by seeing the film.

Rich cast makes 'O Brother' comedic hit

Homer would have been proud of the Coen brothers.

"O Brother, Where Art Thou?" is a splendid tale of comedy, music, action and crime, written and directed by Joel and Ethan Coen ("The Big Lebowski").

The movie, based on Homer's "The Odyssey," is the story of three escaped convicts in the Depression era who cross the state of Mississippi in search of lost treasure. In the process, the three yokels encounter several obstacles, including a seedy Southern politician, an even seedier Bible salesman (John Goodman, of "Roseanne" fame), and a trio of seductive sirens. Holb Hunter ("The Piano") rounds out the cast as the wife of one of the convicts.

The cast of characters is as rich and colorful as Homer's original poem. George Clooney ("The Thin Red Line") plays the philosophical leader of the group, Ulysses Everett McGill (the name "Ulysses" being, of course, a reference to Homer), and is accompanied by Pete (John Turturro, "Rounders") and Delmar (Tim Blake Nelson).

The talent of these three men is matched only by the storyline and the twists and turns that accompany it. The Coen brothers don't just stick to one genre: they add comedy to the drama and then fantastic music on top of that.

The Coen brothers also are sure to add an element of controversy by addressing the racism of the South during the Depression era via a chilling scene with the Ku Klux Klan.

Recipient of Best Performance by an Actor in a Motion Picture — Comedy/Musical and nominated for Best Motion Picture at the annual Golden Globe awards, this film especially will draw lovers of the not-so-mainstream film, as well as those moviegoers who just enjoy a good story.

guitars with techno backbeats.

Keep in mind that the downside is considerable. Lopez's limited vocal range destroys her chances of making each track a force in its own right because her voice sounds the same in each song. It's almost as if Lopez is taking advantage of the fact that real singers like Mariah Carey aren't receiving much air play these days.

Besides her super-processed vocal tracks, Lopez attempts a more hip-hop sound to compensate for her pipes. With Puff "master of the rip-off" Daddy in the producer's seat, she just ends up piggy-backing off acts that are actually good. Mimicry of Madonna is evident in tracks such as "I'm Real," and she puts her spin on the Destiny's Child sound throughout the album.

Opening the album with the catchy "Love Don't Cost a Thing," Lopez pumps out a track that everyone may as well get used to because it will undoubtedly be played on mainstream radio for the next six months on heavy rotation. As Lopez sings the lyrics "Think I wanna drive your Benz I don't. Think I'm gonna spend your cash I won't. Even if you were broke my love don't cost a thing," you have to wonder if she's been watching the sales of "Independent Woman."

Unfortunately, "J. Lo" won't get nearly as many people moving as Madonna has done even with her latest effort. The album just doesn't pack the punch that recent dance music has had with the exception of a few tracks.

No one should feel sorry for Lopez. Between her acting, her albums and appearances in slinky outfits that show off her true, ahem, assets, Lopez will have enough cash to put out as many albums as she wants. Maybe the next one will be better.

experience and association with such luminaries in the culinary world as Andre Solner and Steven Pyles.

"They taught me to share ideas," he said.

McGraw graduated from Johnson and Wales University, College of Culinary Arts in Michigan.

He said what he appreciated most of all about the culinary school was that it taught him different ways of doing the same thing.

He began his career with a small diner, Lily's, eight years ago. Since that time, McGraw has climbed the ladder of success.

"He is young, yet he worked in different locations to get a feel for a variety of food," Snyder said.

Indeed, his walk of life provided him with ample travel opportunities.

"Bon Appetit (food and entertaining magazine) allowed me to be on the road a lot," he said. "Besides, I visited Great Britain, Italy and Sweden as a corporate chef."

McGraw said he does not regret giving up his travel abroad. Employment at a university implies dealing with different hours.

"With the college, I have more time to be with my family and raise my 4-month-old daughter," McGraw said.

"There's a writing bug in our family," he said. "Sarah has the gift of writing. She's a spectacular writer."

Baum said she credits her great-great grandfather with inspiring her to put pen to paper.

"I liked writing stories when I was a kid, and I thought, 'Hey, I could be a writer because my great-great grandfather wrote 'The Wizard of Oz,' and I might have the genes for it," she said. "Every once in a while, I get the urge to write."

As early as the 1960s, literary critics have tried to read messages of a political nature into L. Frank Baum's works. Anne Phillips, associate professor of English, has taught the book in her Literature for Children and American Children's Literature classes, and said she thinks Baum didn't intentionally place such messages in his writings.

"L. Frank Baum doesn't seem to have intended to put political statements in his books," she said. "But there are striking similarities to the time period. We're all products of the time period in which we live."

Baum said she, too, doesn't think any political statements were intentionally included in the Oz books.

"He wrote it for kids. I can't imagine he'd put any propaganda in his writings. It's an idea that really amuses me," she said.

Still, Phillips said, the Oz books contribute much to American culture and to literature.

"All of the stories have characters that are rich and well-done, and there are important scenes in the book that were cut out of the film that would've added so much," she said.

"The Wizard of Oz' is just such an important aspect of American literature."

When she has a family of her own, Baum said she intends to keep the memory of her great-great grandfather alive by sharing her love of 'The Wizard of Oz' with her children.

"I want to share my collection of books with my kids," she said. "It would be nice to tell my kids about it and share that with them."

have three children, one of whom is an OSU student.

"She is very worried about the kids and the members of the families of the other victims," Bachman said. "She knows Denver was a good pilot."

Hancock's mother, Nicki Hancock of Prairie Village, Kan., said she had received calls from across the nation praising her son.

"It's wonderful to know that we have so many friends and so many people thought so highly of Will," she said. "I think we're still in shock at this point. But we believe that prayers really are heard. We want to thank everyone for their prayers."

Living Off Campus?

Ready to pay higher rent?

One point our mayor, city officials, and landlords all agree: mandatory city code inspection of apartments will INCREASE RENT in Manhattan! And yes, we've been told fraternities and sororities will be inspected too. It's not too late to PROTEST. ATTEND the committee meeting at city hall, 7:30 p.m. Wednesday, Jan. 27. There are less expensive alternatives. Questions, call us 537-7991.

Residence halls to go smoke-free next fall

■ Study determined 80 percent of hall residents non-smokers; halls prepare to ban smoking.

By REBEKKA MARTIN
Kansas State Collegian

The quest for a healthier environment in the residence halls has left students divided on smokers and non-smokers' rights and unsure of new smoking rules. The K-State residence halls will be smoke-free beginning Aug. 17.

"We will not allow smoking in student rooms or in public areas," Derek Jackson, assistant director of Housing and Dining Services, said.

Individual residence halls got to choose whether to put a smoking lounge in the basement, but most halls have voted against it. Residence halls also can choose whether to prohibit smoking around entries to the building, which Ford Hall has done.

Jackson said the Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls voted to go smoke-free based on a study that showed 80 percent of residents were non-smokers, while at that time, only 50 percent of the floors were smoke-free. The percentage of smoke-free floors was increased to 70 percent for the 2000-2001 school year and will increase to 100 percent next year.

Jackson said the action was taken because each year many residents complained about smoke that filters into non-smoking areas.

Candice Cottrell, freshman in business administration and a resident of Moore Hall, supports the new rule.

"There are plenty of places to smoke, and there are so many that live in one building," Cottrell said.

Cottrell said that although she marked that she did not smoke on her housing contract, she was put on a smoking floor. However, she said she doesn't think anyone on her floor has smoked there this year.

Cottrell said she thought the new rule should include the outside of the residence halls as well.

"I don't even think they should be able to smoke on the front steps," she said. "It's gross."

Angel Martinez, freshman in electrical engineering and a resident of Haymaker Hall, had a different perspective and said the new ban on smoking may affect his decision on whether to live in the residence halls again next year.

Martinez said he was neutral about the new rule, but isn't sure why it is in place.

"I don't see why they're getting rid of the smoking floors," he said. "Most people who live on the smoking floors don't seem to mind it."

Juggling club teaches tricks, skills to scouts

By APRIL MIDDLETON
Kansas State Collegian

Tennis balls, rings and clubs flew through the air at the Boys and Girls Club of Manhattan on Monday, falling on the ground and occasionally coming back down in the hands of an ecstatic cub scout.

Two members of the K-State Juggling Club spent an hour with the Cub Scouts showing them the basics and eventually handing out juggling equipment to each youth.

"We wanted to get the boys excited about cub scouts," said Aaron Rodehorst, district associate for Boy Scouts of America. "This seemed like a good idea, and the boys seem interested."

Though Monday's activities with the Cub Scouts didn't take the format of a regular meeting, it was a rare opportunity to show off their skills and get in some practice time.

The club normally meets twice a month to practice its juggling and teach each other new tricks. Krista Bright, president of the juggling club, said when one of the approximately 15 members masters a new trick, everyone else wants to learn.

"Some people are better than others and know cool tricks," Bright said. "When they show the rest of us, we try to teach ourselves."

David Anson, freshman in English, said he joined the club so he could practice the tricks he knows and learn new ones.

"I'm hoping some of the members are more advanced than I am, so I can learn some new tricks," Anson said. "I might do some learning, and I might do some teaching. Either way it is going to be fun."

The club contains some members, such as Anson, who have juggled for years, and others who started by joining the club.

Bright learned to juggle three years ago when she joined the club. She said posters for the club convinced her juggling would be a fun skill to learn.

"It's harder than it looks," Bright said. "I've learned to do balls and rings, but I'll feel really cool when I can do clubs."

Anson, who has learned to juggle anything from basketballs to flaming torches, said he has learned that practice makes perfect. Sometimes, as Anson also has learned, practice doesn't come without pain.

"You can't just pick objects up and throw them around," Anson said. "You learn that how you toss something determines whether you can catch it or not. And when you miss a club or something, it can really hurt."

Wintery weather to continue

■ Manhattan, nationwide weather conditions worsen.

By CRISTINA JANNEY
Kansas State Collegian

Watch your step. Conditions overnight could make sidewalks slick and difficult for K-State ground crews to deal with, John Woods, facility services director, said. Woods said Monday he was concerned that the melting snow could freeze overnight and be covered with new snow. The snow can be cleared by brush equipment, but the ice would have to be treated with sand and salt, he said.

Removal crews were on standby Monday night with plans to be called in as early as 4 a.m. today.

"We keep a pretty close eye on the weather," Woods said.

He said he hoped the crews could address sidewalk needs before students started flooding the campus. The operation moves more quickly then, and students are safe from any possible flying debris from brushes, he said.

Snow accumulation was forecast at 1 to 3 inches for Monday with an additional inch of possible accumulation Monday night.

There is a chance for light snow today. Highs should be in the mid 30s to low 40s today, and lows should be in the mid 20s tonight.

A broad storm sweeping across the central part of the nation spread a hazardous layer of ice on highways in Nebraska and Iowa on Monday, and trucks were banned from some highways covered with ice and snow

Trees on site of alumni center moved

By KAREN MAYSE
Kansas State Collegian

Trees usually aren't mobile, but these trees will be moved several times before they are set in their final location.

About 50 young trees recently were moved from the future site of the KSU Alumni Association center south of Memorial Stadium to a temporary home at the corner of Sunset and Anderson avenues.

Karen Schroeder, communications director for the Alumni Association, said the association board will be meeting next week to decide whether to begin construction on the center next spring.

The project is in a quiet fundraising stage, but once a certain funding level is reached, the association will break ground.

Schroeder said the university has been helpful in finding a temporary location for the trees.

The trees were planted on the construction site because of a contract with the city last year to widen Anderson Avenue, said Kevin Schorzman, area engineer for the Kansas Department of Transportation.

Schorzman said KDOT generally focuses on the functional part of road construction, such as building the road and curbs, but in this case, the contract included planting trees and seeding grass — something that created a problem for the Alumni Association.

"We were concerned about damaging the young trees during construction of the center, so we're very happy that we have been able to work out a solution with the help of the university," said Amy Button Renz, president of the Alumni Association.

"We've been working with the university on all phases of the project," Schroeder said.

Mark Taussig, university landscape architect, said at the time the trees originally were planted, it was not certain the site would be used for the Alumni Association building.

"As it turns out, we got a site plan that includes the disturbance of the entire site," Taussig said.

Most of the trees shouldn't suffer from being moved so often, Taussig said. They are young trees that are well-suited to this environment, and this is the best time to move them because they are dormant this time of year.

They really didn't have enough time to establish roots where they were planted, Taussig said, so they should not be damaged too much by the move.

Taussig said he expects that all of the trees will be moved this week. At the completion of the construction project, they will be returned to their original location.

News of the weird

Daily Variety reported in January that Britain's Pathe Pictures had scheduled an April shooting date for the $7-million comedy "Thunderpants," which it described as the story of "an 11-year-old boy whose amazing ability (to break wind) leads him first to fame and then to death row, before it helps him to fulfill his ambition of becoming an astronaut."

Weapons, bribery trial of 'Puffy' Combs begins

NEW YORK — The weapons and bribery trial of Sean "Puffy" Combs began Monday, with prosecutors for the first time saying he fired a gun inside a Times Square nightclub as one of his proteges allegedly shot and wounded three people.

"Mr. Combs fired a shot" into the club's ceiling, Assistant District Attorney Matthew Bogdanos said in opening statements. "Witnesses will say they saw the muzzle flash."

Combs, 31, isn't accused of shooting anyone in Club New York on Dec. 27, 1999. He was arrested after he fled the club with his girlfriend, actress-singer Jennifer Lopez, who has not been charged.

The defense said in its opening statement that the prosecution is picking on Combs because he is famous.

"This was a star-struck selective prosecution of a superstar," defense attorney Benjamin Brafman said. "This prosecution is about fame and celebrity, not about a search for truth and justice."

Combs' rap protege, Jamal "Shyne" Barrow, 21, is charged with attempted murder and assault on allegedly wounding the three club patrons. He allegedly shot a 9mm pistol during a dispute in which another man reportedly insulted Combs and threw money in his face.

Filibuster of nomination of Ashcroft less likely

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Sen. Patrick Leahy, the ranking Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee, said Monday he would vote against Attorney General-designate John Ashcroft but would not support a filibuster to stop the nomination.

Leahy's opposition to a filibuster lessened the chance that opponents could successfully use delaying tactics to prevent confirmation of President Bush's most controversial Cabinet choice.

"John Ashcroft's unyielding and intemperate positions on many issues raise grave doubts both about how he will interpret the oath he would take as attorney general to enforce the laws ... and about how he will exercise the enormous power of that office," Leahy told the Senate.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., also announced Monday she would vote against Ashcroft, telling a news conference: "His record and his views placed him on the distant shores of American jurisprudence."

Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., has said he's considering a filibuster but Democratic floor leader Tom Daschle of South Dakota previously announced he would not support the tactic. Opponents would need 60 votes in the 100-member Senate to stop a filibuster, a delaying maneuver that is more commonly used to block legislation than a nominee for the president's Cabinet.

Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott has said all 50 Republicans in the Senate would back Ashcroft and predicted Monday that 60 to 70 senators would support the nominee. The Judiciary Committee is expected to send the nomination to the Senate this week, and Lott said the chamber could vote as early as Thursday.

Judge in antitrust case vs. Microsoft criticized

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Microsoft's lawyers told a federal appeals court Monday that the judge who ordered the company split in two had made "indefensible" public comments about the case.

In a court filing, the company's lawyers also said the Justice Department did not show that Microsoft had monopoly power or that it engaged in anti-competitive conduct.

U.S. District Judge Thomas Penfield Jackson ordered "extreme relief" — an order last June 7 that the computer giant be broken into two companies — the company's court brief said.

The U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit is scheduled to hear arguments Feb. 26 and 27 in Microsoft's appeal of Jackson's breakup order.

The company's brief said: "The district judge's public comments about the merits of the case and his ... attacks on Microsoft are indefensible." Such comments "demonstrate an animus towards Microsoft so strong that it inevitably infected his rulings," the brief added.

The Microsoft brief said the author of a new book reported that Jackson compared Microsoft executives to unremorseful gang members convicted of murder and compared company Chairman Bill Gates to Napoleon. The judge also was quoted as saying he trusted Justice Department lawyers.

Haidi Tu, graduate student in computer science, and Wei Zou, graduate student in human nutrition, are two student members of Falun Gong who disagree with an Associated Press report Jan. 23 that five of their members set themselves on fire in Tiananmen Square.

Falun Gong members speak out

By JESSICA PITTS
Kansas State Collegian

Five Falun Gong followers set themselves on fire Jan. 23 in China's Tiananmen Square in an act of defiance of the communist government's 18-month ban on their movement, according to an Associated Press report.

However, two K-State Falun Gong members said Falun Gong members might not have been involved.

"My opinion is that these people and their relationship with the Falun Dafa hasn't been clarified," said Wei Zou, graduate student in human nutrition and group member. "The government and the press only claim these people are part of our group."

The Falun Dafa, an advanced system of cultivation and qigong practice, introduced by Master Li Hongzhi, has attracted more than 100 million people all over the world for its powerful mechanism in healing, stress relief and health improvements, Zou said.

"We are a peaceful, non-violent organization," Zou said. "I don't believe this could have happened."

The Falun Gong agreed with Zou in a statement issued Jan. 24 that said: "This so-called suicide attempt on Tiananmen Square has nothing to do with Falun Gong practitioners because the teachings of Falun Gong prohibit any form of killing. Li Hongzhi, the founder of the practice, has explicitly stated that suicide is a sin."

Zou said he believes this is an attempt by the communist regime to defame the practice of Falun Gong. He said the actions of the group have remained consistently non-violent and peaceful based on the principles of truthfulness, compassion and forbearance.

"We just want people to realize that the Falun Dafa was not involved, in our opinion," he said.

Zou, along with other members of the group on

"I began to swim and exercise, and I improved my shape considerably, but I wanted an activity that also improved my mind."

— Wei Zou, Falun Gong member campus, is encouraging others to become involved in the group by attending free instruction classes.

"These are absolutely free to anyone," he said. "They have the freedom to come and go as they please. The group is very simple and loose."

The Falun Dafa has a set of five exercises specially designed to complement one's cultivation. Four of the exercises involve physical movements, and one involves meditation.

"We want to encourage others to come because, as members, we benefit, too," Zou said. "It is a lost area, and we want to bring some of it back."

Zou said he began the exercises as a way to improve his health.

"I began to swim and exercise, and I improved my shape considerably," he said, "but I wanted an activity that also improved my mind. Falun Dafa does that for me. After having conflicts in mind, I found it became easier to maintain my mental health."

Haidi Tu, graduate student in computer science, also began practicing Falun Dafa for health reasons.

"Before I started, I could easily catch a cold or my stomach always felt bad," Tu said. "Now I feel healthy. It also taught me to be nicer to people. I am a more easygoing person, and Falun Dafa helps me deal with relationships better."

Plans for widening highway under way

By BENJAMIN HODGE
Kansas State Collegian

The Kansas Department of Transportation's recent announcement regarding the widening of a portion of Kansas Highway 18 does not address all the concerns of local officials.

Although the issue largely deals with money, local officials said there are better plans that can be made with the current amount of money.

Between Interstate 70 and Ogden, Kan., K-18 is a two-lane highway, and KDOT is planning to improve the existing roadway corridor to a four-lane expressway on K-18, beginning at I-70 and proceeding northeast to near the Union Pacific Railroad overpass, according to a recent news release from KDOT's Office of Transportation Information.

The plans call for most of the two-lane stretch of highway to be expanded to four lanes, as K-18 is built between Manhattan and Ogden. However, KDOT intends to leave a significant portion of K-18, roughly between the Kansas River and Ogden untouched. This part of K-18 is the precise part on which area officials would like KDOT to concentrate.

Other local projects depend on the construction of this part of K-18, said Dick Hayter, the chair of the Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce Transportation Task force.

The state has about $25 million reserved for the project, and the addition of the remaining section of K-18 would bring the total to about $55 million, Hayter said. Most of the added cost would come from the construction of a new interchange in Ogden, he said. Local officials prefer that the area of K-18 between the river and Ogden would receive top priority for several reasons.

In the upcoming years, construction will be done on some of the runways at the Manhattan airport, Hayter said, and it would be most efficient to include the completion of this northern portion of K-18 — between the river and Ogden — in the plans. The Manhattan airport sits to the east of the portion of K-18 that KDOT is planning to leave alone.

Hayter said if this area of K-18 is not included in the plans, then it likely would need to be redone anyway when work is done on the airport runways, resulting in more trouble in the long run.

Similarly, Wildcat Creek Road, which is connected to this controversial section of K-18, will need construction in future years. Wildcat Creek Road is one of the two roads that feeds into the corporate technology park, where about 1,000 people work, Hayter said.

The road connects the park to K-18, and Hayter said it would be best to work on this stretch of K-18 now, rather than later, when Wildcat Creek Road is redone.

The K-18 construction near Ogden also creates a flooding problem, Hayter said. This was shown in a flood that occurred in 1993.

He also said a two-lane section of highway in between two four-lane sections would cause a bottleneck situation in terms of traffic.

Local officials hope all of the money needed to complete the K-18 highway project will be raised, but if not, they hope KDOT will begin the project at Ogden and work south, Hayter said.

Airport director Ken Black, who said he agrees with city officials and the Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce, said the overpass over the Union Pacific Railroad that now is being proposed also will not work because it will be in the way of the airport entrance. Black said the overpass will need to be moved to the west.

KDOT official Marty Mathews said the construction of the current plans will begin sometime between 2004 and 2009. Mathews said 2.3 miles of road is included in the plans. This includes a Kansas Highway 113 interchange and a number of bridges, he said.

"My only concern is the town's economy," said Kevin Meyers, senior in Bible/Cross-Cultural Ministries at Manhattan Christian College. "They're trying to revitalize the town as it is, and anything to jeopardize the traffic flow would hurt the economy," he said.

Question: What is your solution to the parking problem at K-State?

With regards to all of the parking problems, we should build a slide from Bramlage that goes all the way down to the Student Union.

If you want to solve the parking problem, I say all the people who jog laps around city park should just jog to class instead. That way they don't have to drive.

About the parking problem, K-State, just build a garage, all right? Just give in and build a garage. This is ridiculous.

Monorail. Monorail. Monorail.

Let's make Tuttle Creek flood, and that way we can have a city like Venice and have little boats that take us to class.

Build a lazy river that goes all around campus, and if you need to get off at a building, they could just turn the jets down for you.

How can Parking Services solve the parking problem? Well, for starters, to make more money they could oversell each spot ...oh, wait a minute.

I don't think freshmen should be allowed to bring their cars to K-State college.

The answer to the parking problem? Graduation.

What parking problem?

I have a simple solution to the parking problem. Tell Jon Wefald he has to move off campus, then he will realize what an idiot he has been in not building more parking stalls. Enrollment is going up. We should have more parking stalls. It's that simple.

My solution to the campus parking problem: take away the reserved parking places from Anderson Hall and all of the deans. Then you will see the problem addressed.

The solution to solving the parking problem at K-State is for people to quit being lazy. If they'd either a) walk, b) ride their bike or c) if they insist on being lazy, carpool, we would have a lot less parking problems.

Off the Topic

Did anybody else see that Super Bowl commercial with the squirrels? I want to know how much that EBS corporation paid K-State to borrow our squirrels.

One beer bottle: $3. Two rides to the hospital: $500. One night in jail: $5,000. Knowing that she will have two felonies on her record for life: priceless.

And once again, the winner of the Super Bowl is Budweiser.

I think instead of a Wal-Mart Supercenter we need to look into getting a Target.

Hey, Keira Mann, I may not be Fred Flintstone, but I can make your bed rock.

I just wanted to thank the grounds crew for doing a real job on cleaning off the sidewalks. I was on campus at 6 a.m. on Monday morning, and they were perfectly clear. I didn't have to slip once. Thanks, guys.

Question for Thursday: Should the residence halls go smoke-free? Why or why not?

Humorous posters not meant to be offensive

Editor,

Last Wednesday there was a column warning others not to mistake thoughtlessness for humor. Today, I warn you not to mistake a joke for anything more than that. I am the proud creator of the "Free Breast Exam" poster that was hanging in my window. My sole intention was to bring a minuscule amount of laughter to anyone who read it.

If women came to my door requesting a free breast exam, that would just be a beneficial by-product.

College is hard, and I like to be funny. I just thought I would try to bring the two worlds together to brighten someone's day. I did not expect them to collide in a fiery ball of verbal attacks on my character.

On the fourth day the sign was up, two women came to my door and asked me take it down. I was happy they didn't want a free breast exam and said I would. I told them I was sorry if I offended them. They asked if I had thought about breast cancer patients. I hadn't and felt bad.

Immediately, I took down the sign and started work on a new one. This one said, "Free Hugs." This remained up for one evening before the residence life coordinator told me someone complained, and he wanted me to take it down. Now, I ask, who would complain about a "Free Hugs" sign? Armless people? They wouldn't have to, because I'd hug them also. But if I did offend anybody, or you want to comment about my poster, you are free to write me or stop by for a free hug as an apologetic gesture. If you are female, I encourage it.

Furthermore, the author of the previously mentioned column wrote, "What self-respecting woman would want to be associated with someone who was trying to objectify women as an object for his pleasure..." Along with that sentence needing clarification, it did offend some of my female friends. As hard as it might be for some to believe, I do have friends of the opposite sex. They all considered themselves to be self-respecting women.

I think some people need to lighten up and not take things so personally, especially if they weren't meant to offend anybody. Also, I wanted to let everyone know that I'm working on a new sign. It reads "Free Sense of Humor," followed by a room number.

Capital punishment should be eliminated due to 2 overwhelming flaws

There are two further comments I'd like to make on the topic of the death penalty. First: the exoneration of Christopher Ochoa on Jan. 16 for a crime in which he was serving a life sentence illustrates still another reason for the abolition of the death penalty: police coercion.

There already are numerous reasons for abolishing the death penalty, ranging from the utilitarian (e.g. it's more expensive than a life sentence, often the innocent are wrongly convicted) to the intellectual (e.g. no opportunity for rehabilitation nor restitution, it doesn't deter capital offenses, it's inhumane, it demonstrates a lack of respect toward humanity as a whole, it appeals to one of the most base of human emotions — revenge). Last summer I wrote a column in the Collegian titled "Deadly Justice," which outlined these reasons in greater detail.

And now there's the case of Christopher Ochoa. In 1988, Pizza Hut employee Nancy DePriest was raped and murdered in Austin, Texas. Ochoa, then 22 and a former honor student in high school, never had been in trouble.

During a two-day interrogation, the Austin police falsely told Ochoa that his friend Richard Danzinger had confessed to the crime, and that if he didn't cooperate, he would receive the death penalty. Moreover, the police concocted for Ochoa a tale of torture that was even worse than what actually happened to DePriest.

Ochoa not only confessed but also testified against Danzinger. During the trial Ochoa gave testimony that recounted the story of torture that the police invented, a story that DePriest's mother, Jeanette Popp, said gave her nightmares for years.

Both Ochoa and Danzinger received life sentences. While in prison, Danzinger was beaten and now suffers from severe permanent brain damage.

Then, in 1996, another convict, Achim Josef Marino, having just undergone a religious conversion, wrote to Texas state officials confessing to the crime for which Ochoa and Danzinger were convicted. Marino even told authorities where he hid the handcuffs and gun used in the crime, which the police later found in Marino's mother's house.

Although Marino stated that he acted alone, the police still tried to connect Ochoa and Danzinger to the crime. Marino wrote Gov. George W. Bush's office in 1998, but the letter was ignored.

In 1999, Ochoa wrote to the Innocence Project at the University of Wisconsin and together with a conscientious Travis County district attorney, DNA tests were performed that implicated Marino and exonerated both Ochoa and Danzinger.

Danzinger will remain in state custody until institutional care can be arranged for him.

The officers who extracted the false confession are now under investigation by the Travis County district attorney's office and the Texas Rangers.

As a recent editorial about this case in the Washington Post pointed out, the threat of execution by the police to obtain a confession from the innocent is another of the noxious effects the death penalty is capable of producing ... even in situations where capital punishment is not ultimately sought.

On the positive side, since Bush left the Texas State House for the White House, new Texas governor, Rick Perry, and several state senators have proposed new minimum standards for death penalty cases, thus backing away from the old Texas tough-on-crime crusade led by Bush and most Republican leaders to a more rational approach.

Second: Western Europeans are much puzzled by the support many Americans have for the death penalty and deeply troubled by how many American politicians embrace capital punishment for political gain.

Moreover, they are troubled by the fact that President George W. Bush as governor of Texas has presided over more executions than any other contemporary leader in a developed first-world nation.

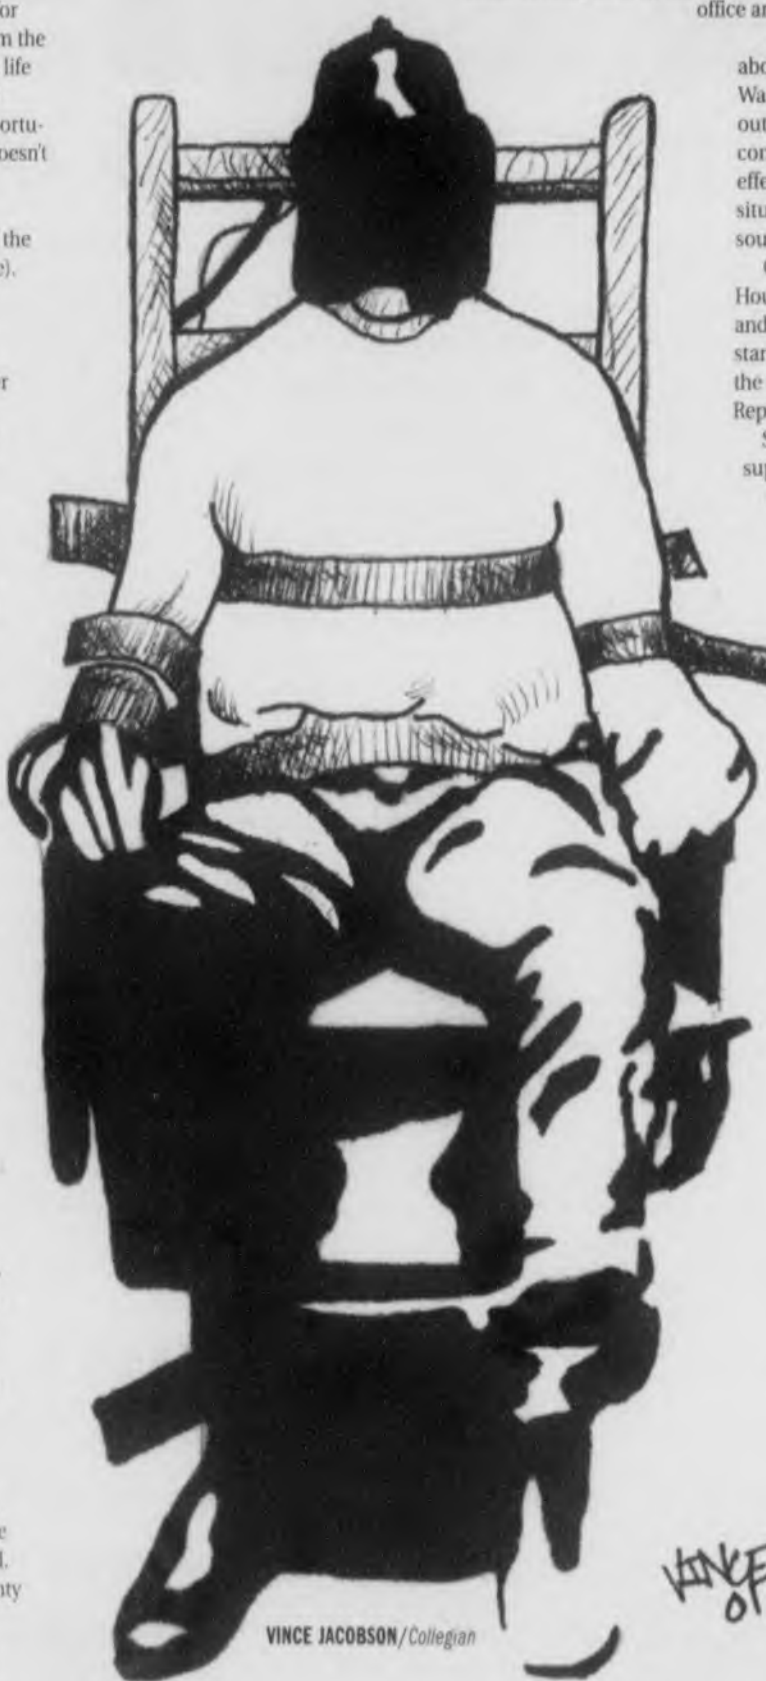

It would be unsurprising to most Americans that our 2000 presidential election was big news abroad, especially in light of the fact that the United States at present is the world's sole superpower. What many Americans don't know is that one of the big issues from the election reported on in Western Europe was the issue of the death penalty.

Eugen Freund, Washington bureau chief for the ORF Austrian Television, said during the general election, "Almost every day, we get a call from our office in Vienna telling us, 'There is another execution in Texas. Can you do a story?' We don't even know about it because it is not covered in the American papers, which we have as our source."

Claus Kleber, Washington bureau chief for the German television network ARD, said, "Germans are fascinated with the American culture of putting people to death, especially in Texas ... George Bush, who has a tremendous record of executions, especially in this election year in Texas, somehow is the symbol for this American attitude and it is not much liked by Germans."

Recently, the United States has begun more and more to depend on the help and cooperation of our Western European allies to support our international interests. It will be interesting to see how effective President Bush will be in obtaining this support from these nations that keep him in such contempt.

Priorities reveal much about personality

They say you can tell what's important to people by looking at their calendars. That is, you can tell what someone's priorities are by how he or she spends their time. With the beginning of another year, I think we all would do well to ask ourselves what we spend our time doing and to ask ourselves if we are satisfied with our choices.

For many people, the most important issue is school. They constantly obsess over their papers, their homework and their grades. They spend their Friday nights studying alone or typing papers. The library is just like another home to them. If they're reasonably lucky, their final reward is the number four on a piece of paper at the end of the semester.

For others, the most important thing is having fun. They go out three or four nights a week, and half the bartenders in town know them by sight. They go from place to place, drinking and having a great time with their friends. They finally stumble home at about 3 a.m., and then they do it all again the next night. Their reward is four years of pleasure and the beginnings of a ruined liver.

Still, others put work first. They get jobs at Wal-Mart or Burger King, and they spend 30 hours per week there. They get degrees in business management, and then they climb the corporate ladder with incredible speed.

They start as lowly executives and work their way up to the inner circle of corporate godhood. Their reward is a fistful of colored paper and the start of a fine ulcer.

I realize I'm not being fair. The scholar benefits from learning, the partier has a lot of fun and knows how not to worry about small things and the businessperson gets the American Dream: a nice spouse, a big foreign car and a million-dollar ski lodge in Colorado.

What, though, have they really gained? In the long run, what matters most? Knowledge is forgotten, chemically-induced highs don't last forever, and in a thousand years all of the stuff anyone accumulates today will more likely than not be a pile of dust.

We all are mortal. When I look into the mirror, it seems incomprehensible that the life will ebb out of my body someday, but my intellect tells me it will. What's worse, the universe doesn't give second chances to people who waste their lives the first time around. This is why it's important to reflect on how we are spending our lives.

Do we do hurtful things in order to get what we want? Does the scholar forget his friends in his thirst for knowledge? Does the intrepid businessman see acquaintances as anything except stepping-stones to success?

People are infinitely more important than knowledge, money, or fun. Why can't we focus more on making the world a better place for others? I'm not suggesting everyone should live solely to serve others, but life would be much more enjoyable if everyone just put others first every once in a the party animal really connect with people or does he just drink with them? Does the intrepid businessman see acquaintances as anything except stepping-stones to success?

People are infinitely more important than knowledge, money, or fun. Why can't we focus more on making the world a better place for others? I'm not suggesting everyone should live solely to serve others, but life would be much more enjoyable if everyone just put others first every once in a while. What could be a nobler calling than caring for others? If it's so noble, why don't more people try to do it?

Perhaps we don't invest in others because it's such a hard thing to do. It's easy to serve ourselves because we know exactly what we want. Most of us have few compunctions about doing whatever we have to in order to get what we want. When we have chances to serve others, however, we suddenly become busy, tired and apathetic.

This state of affairs might be satisfactory for most of us, but the world doesn't become a better place through apathy and self-service. If there's any truth in the old proverb that a man has three score and 10 years to live, most of the people reading this have about 50 years left. Will we spend them in serving ourselves or in caring for others? The choice is yours; the time to decide is now.

On the Air
Campbell's appearance on "The Price is Right" will air at 10 a.m. Feb. 7 on CBS.

Carolyn Campbell, third-year junior in interior architecture, was a contestant on "The Price is Right." She won several items, including about 30 dozen eggs, bedroom furniture and an oven.

Student contestant on 'Price is Right'

Being on a game show is not something junior Carolyn Campbell ever thought would actually happen to her.

But, over winter break, her dream became a reality as she was the next contestant on "The Price is Right."

Traveling to Los Angeles with a group of architecture students for a convention, Campbell, junior in interior architecture, came back with approximately $7,600 in prizes and an experience she's not likely to soon forget.

"When I won and got to go up on stage, it was like one of those, 'This isn't happening,' kind of things," Campbell said. "It was beyond real."

Kelli Campbell, Carolyn's sister, said she didn't believe it when she found out her sister had been on the show.

"I heard it from my grandma, and I didn't believe her," Campbell, freshman in open-option, said. "Then I called Carolyn on her cell phone, and it was a shock."

Before leaving for L.A., Campbell and the students who would be in the studio audience shared a number of lunches in the K-State Student Union watching "The Price is Right."

However, none of them actually thought they would be on the show.

"It was funny because she had just told me that she hoped one of us would get on, but she didn't want it to be her because she was nervous," Beth Sager, junior in interior architecture, said.

Then, a familiar name was called.

"I just blanked," Campbell said. "My friend pushed me up, and I ran down there."

Campbell said she used to watch the show with her grandma when she was a kid. Campbell and her sister used to joke around about what they would do if they ever got on the show.

"My sister and I used to talk about it, and I always said if I ever got on, I'd probably win the bedroom set and not the car," Campbell said. "And I won the bedroom set."

However, Campbell is happy with what she won.

Campbell then was invited onto the stage to meet Bob Barker, the host of the show.

"He's a star, and he acted like a star," she said. "He was a nice guy."

Campbell said being on the show was a lot like watching it on TV.

"The way you see the show taped is the way it is aired," she said.

"It's exactly what you see. They are a well-oiled machine. It's a 29-year-old show, and they move it."

Ian Waldschmidt, junior in architecture, said being in the audience was an experience he'll never forget.

"I've always wanted to be on the show," he said. "When we decided to go to L.A., it was one of the first things that came to mind."

Super Bowl commercials spark interest in students; add shock, humor to game

By NANCY HULL
Kansas State Collegian

Football fanatics will remember the actual Super Bowl game, but it's no secret that almost all viewers will remember the game's commercials.

Sunday's Super Bowl XXXV featured 55 ads, and advertisers paid as much as $2.3 million for a 30-second segment.

The most popular ads were from companies that are notorious for being big players in Super Bowl ads, Todd Donovan, assistant professor of marketing, said.

PepsiCo. and Anheuser-Busch always score big with viewers, and Donovan said he wasn't surprised with their popularity this year. USA Today's Ad Meter results, the Super Bowl ad rankings that Donovan said are the standard ratings results, gave Anheuser-Busch four of the top 10 spots, and two of PepsiCo's ads made top 10. The first commercial of the game, Anheuser-Busch: Cebic's dream date goes awry, won the No. 1 ranking.

Donovan said the popular commercials succeeded because of their shock value. His favorite three commercials all had the surprise element. They are Anheuser-Busch: Alien "Pooch" takes space journey; Pepsi: Bob Dole parodies his Viagra ad; and E-Trade: Superhuman Security Guard.

"You don't expect Bob Dole to start talking about Viagra," Donovan said. "It just shocked us."

While Donovan's favorite three all were humorous, he said funny doesn't necessarily equal increased sales.

"An add may be hilarious, but if it doesn't move people to go out and buy it, there's no point," he said.

Last year, 40 percent of the Super Bowl commercials were dot.coms, while only three dot.coms were in Sunday's lineup.

Donovan said he believes the dot.coms last year were so focused on humor they didn't motivate people to visit the Web sites.

Lucas Brown, senior in advertising, said he thinks the failure of the dot.coms was due to the large amount of them.

"Everyone remembers that they were all dot.coms. But they just ran together, so no one remembered the names. I think they were scared to do it again," Brown said.

Matt Carpenter, senior in public relations and advertising, said the commercials that caught his interest the most were Anheuser-Busch, PepsiCo. and Frito-Lay Doritos because they were based on humor. Two companies that had several commercials, Cingular and Accenture, were too repetitive, Carpenter said.

"They were played the most, but I can't even remember the plot of any of those ads," he said.

Donovan said he was disappointed with companies that ran ads similar to their other ads, like Subway: Dieters inspired by Jared's diet.

"Why run normal ads when the expectations are so high?" he said. "Normal doesn't break through the clutter, and that's what you have to do."

Nebraska might see Cats as easy road win

K-State looks to maintain home-court defense against Huskers

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

For a team that's 0-6 on the road this season, Nebraska might not be expected to have an overabundance of confidence heading into Manhattan tonight to face K-State.

According to Wildcat head coach Jim Wooldridge, however, the Cornhuskers (9-10, 2-4 Big 12) very well could take the same approach as every other squad that has set foot in Bramlage Coliseum, he said.

"I think everybody looks at this road game at Kansas State as a chance to either 'get well' if things aren't going right for them or to continue something positive," Wooldridge said. "In other words, I think they look at us as a real opportunity for a road win."

But who wouldn't, considering the Cats (8-9, 2-4) were picked dead last in both Big 12 preseason polls — and by an especially large margin in the coaches' conference predictions with only 13 points, 15 less than 11th place Baylor.

"That's pretty graphic that they not only picked us last, but they picked us last by a long shot — that's how I see it, anyway," Wooldridge said. "So I think people look at us as a team that they can come into on foreign territory and come up with a win."

"Nebraska is in a much needed win situation and they face us, and I have to believe that they'd be a pretty confident team coming in here."

The Huskers well might need that win, as first-year head coach Barry Collier's club has lost three of its last four games, including a 77-66 loss to Oklahoma on Saturday.

Nevertheless, Nebraska does have experience on its side, Wooldridge said, as the Huskers' starting five consists of four seniors and one junior.

One of those senior veterans, 6-foot-4 guard Cookie Belcher, leads the team in scoring (15.6), assists (4.1) and steals (2.7) per game. Meanwhile, 6-foot-11 center Kimani Friend and forward Steffon Bradford average double figures as well, boasting more than 27 points per game as an inside tandem.

"I think that's enormous," Wooldridge said. "Not only are there four seniors, but Cookie Belcher could be an all-league player. Kimani Friend could be an all-league player, and Bradford, you look at his numbers, he's as productive as any power forward in this league or more."

"So not only are they coming in here with some experience, they're coming in here with some truly good players that are experienced."

However, despite center Kelvin Howell being the only senior in K-State's line-up, the Cats might have recent history on their side.

K-State has won five of its last seven against Nebraska, including six straight in Manhattan.

At any rate, though, the Cats will have to rid the sting of their latest loss, a 92-66 shellacking at the hands of intrastate rival Kansas on Saturday. Sophomore transfer Matt Siebrandt said that won't be much of a problem, though.

"We struggled against KU but I don't think we played bad," he said. "How they played just took us out of our game, and we never really did that much. We're going to look past that and get ready for Nebraska — it's a whole new ball game."

Yet, Siebrandt might not want guard Phineas "Tony" Atchison and forward Travis Reynolds to look past the KU loss.

In fact, Atchison scored a career-high 28 points, the most scored by an opposing player at Allen Fieldhouse since Feb. 4, 1996, and Reynolds notched his fifth double-double of the season with 10 points and 16 rebounds.

Those efforts suited Wooldridge just fine against a team like Kansas, he said.

"Tony's efforts and Travis' individual efforts were outstanding," he said. "That's the fourth-ranked team in the country, and they're going nose-to-nose with them and performing very well."

In any event, K-State has dropped four of its last five games, resulting in a sense of urgency for the Cats to find the winning column once more, forward Quentin Buchanan said.

"This is kind of like a must-win game for us, so we're going to have to go out and play," he said.

Easy to say, but Nebraska will be hungry to snap its road winless streak, Wooldridge said, and the Cats can't afford to expect anything less.

"I think that's another reason why you say, 'Hey, let's put all our marbles into this game,'" Wooldridge said of the Huskers' approach to Saturday. "And they obviously see that we have some

It was a long weekend for the tennis team.

The Wildcats lost 7-0 Saturday to No. 19 Mississippi and then fell to New Mexico 4-3 on Sunday.

"It was tough," head coach Steve Bietau said. "The level of competition was good. A couple matches we did what we needed to do, and then there were others where we didn't execute. We need to step back and look at our preparation and look at what we need to address."

Although the Wildcats were shut out against the Rebels, K-State's top four single players took their opponents to three sets.

No. 1 singles player Alena Jecminkova lost 6-3, 3-6, 5-7 to Mississippi's Julie DeRoo, who is ranked No. 7 in the nation. Petra Sedimajerova fought a close match before losing 7-6, 5-7, 4-6. Captain Eva Novotna and Paulina Castillejos also fought long matches.

"We knew they were ranked 19th," Novotna said. "We expected them to play well. But we managed to take their top four players in three sets. That's a big accomplishment. We all had a chance to win. We have to focus on the pluses."

Against New Mexico, the team started out by winning the doubles point, but it didn't carry the momentum into the rest of the match.

Jecminkova and No. 5 Paulina Castillejos were the only two single winners to win their respective matches. Jecminkova lost 6-0 in the first set before she fought back to win the second and third sets against New Mexico's Natalia Alekhova. Castillejos won her match in a third-set tie-breaker 6-3, 4-6, 1-0 (6).

Despite the outcomes, Bietau said the team performed better against Mississippi.

"I think there is that part where you are playing someone above you, and it's all how you handle it," Bietau said. "There is less of the sense of something to lose. Against New Mexico, I think we came in with a feeling that we had something to lose. And we did. Now we need to comeback. We need to find a way."

Bietau said there were strong individual performances.

"There were some pluses," he said. "Hayley Mciver played at a high level for only being on campus for three weeks. She really progressed over the weekend. Kathy Chuda has been injured and hasn't practiced a lot. She played very well given the circumstances."

The team meets again in Manhattan this weekend for its first home matches of the year. The Wildcats face Southwest Missouri State on Saturday and Utah on Sunday.

"It is still early in the season," Novotna said. "We have lost our first two. But we have two home games coming up, and we will be ready to go out and win some matches."

Cats bring home track trophy from triangular over weekend

The track team now can decorate the jug again.

For winning the Missouri/Kansas/K-State Triangular last weekend, the team was able to take home the traveling whiskey jug, a tradition with the tournament. K-State has captured the jug 10 of the past 12 years.

"We put it in the trophy case," senior Tame Signey said. "It's not that big of a deal. We expect to win it every year. We decorate it, and put all the other teams on it because we have respect for them. I think Missouri painted it all black one year."

With the tournament combining both the men's and women's points, the Wildcats tallied a total of 283, Missouri took second with 253 points and Kansas finished third with 168.

"Collectively, it was a good meet," head coach Cliff Rovelto said. "Both the men's and women's teams did a good job. Missouri has a nice team and they compete to win. KU did not have all their people there. It was unfortunate that they sent four athletes elsewhere, but I don't think it would've made a difference."

The women won nine events. The men won six.

"The stars did their thing in the meet, and the young kids have really worked hard and came through as well," Rovelto said. "This weekend was pretty indicative of the hard work. We really developed as a team."

Leading the way for the women's team was Korene Hinds, who placed first in the 800 meters and the mile. She ran the mile in 4:42.81, which gives her an NCAA automatic qualifying mark.

Rebekah Green continues to dominate the shot put and the weight throw. She threw 56 feet, 5 1/4 inches in the weight throw. She won the shot put by more than 4 feet with a throw of 53 feet, 9 3/4 inches to set a meet record.

Austra Skujyte participated in three events. She won the long jump event with a jump of 19 feet, 1 1/2 inches. She set a NCAA provisional mark in shot put, and she came close to reaching that same goal in the high jump.

"That is really a good meet for her," Rovelto said. "And considering she is still jumping from short approaches makes it more impressive."

Also placing for the Wildcats was Terresha Derossiet in the high jump. Teena Clincy in the 60 meter low hurdles, Ragan Hill in the 60-meter dash and Amanda Crouse in the 1,000 meters.

On the men's side, Shadrack Kimeli won both the 1,000 meters and the mile run. He ran the mile in 4:10.17 seconds. Freshman Joseph Lee won the 800 meters in 1:52.51 seconds. Matt Davis placed first in the 600 yard run, and Clinton Jamison won the triple jump with a leap of 49 feet, 2 1/4 inches.

"Joseph Lee had a strong meet," Rovelto said. "That was a quality time in the 800, and he is just a freshman. That is the fastest he has ever run inside or out."

The team travels to Nebraska this weekend to face the Cornhuskers, Colorado and Abilene Christian.

"Every meet until the conference meet is important," said Signey, who placed second in the weight throw. "I have goals individually to qualify for the NCAA tournament. I am a senior, so I want to make the best of it. I think everyone wants to get better and training will start paying off."

LOCAL TALENT

WHO: Justin Hulsey, acoustic solo performer

Justin Hulsey, sophomore in English, has been writing songs on his acoustic guitar since his freshman year in high school and now performs regularly in Manhattan.

Hulsey's acoustic performances, centering around his strong vocals, have become popular at places such as Espresso Royale Cafe. His next performance will be Feb. 15 at 12th Street Pub with Ian Davidson, he said.

Though Hulsey is an acoustic performer, on his new album, "Weathered," he is backed by a full band. The album, available at Streetside Records, was just released after Hulsey took last semester off to finish it, he said.

Influenced by artists such as Jackson Brown, Bob Dylan and Better than Ezra, Hulsey said each performance is as meaningful as the writing process.

"Whenever I perform, I discover those songs again," he said. "I realize new things about them whenever I play, so the songs mean different things to me every time."

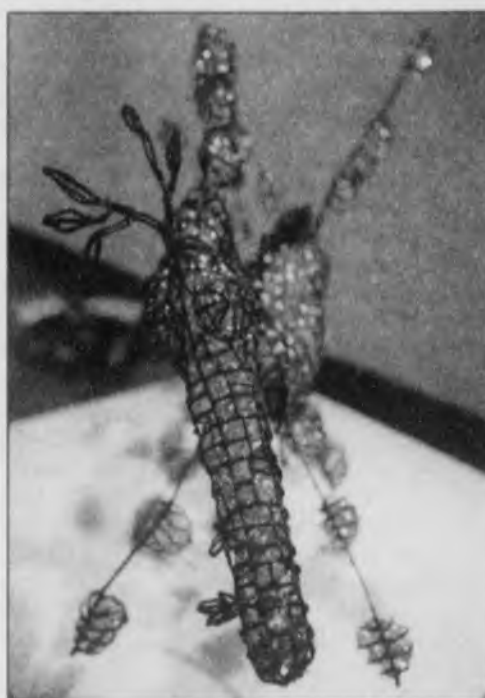

Justin Hulsey can be found at www.justinhulsey.com

Harbstreit's clock and other sculptures are being displayed in the K-State Student Union for the next 2 1/2 weeks. BELOW: Hilary Wahlen's sculpture "Sea Jewel" took about two months to finish. Wahlen's inspiration for the piece came from watching sea dragons on the Discovery Channel.

Students display sculpture at Union exhibit

By KATIE LANE
Kansas State Collegian

"Exposure" is the theme of K-State's first 2001 Sculpture Exhibition.

The display officially opened Monday night, kicking off its 2 1/2 week show. Fourteen undergraduate and graduate art students contributed their work. The students are at varying levels of study, Daniel Hunt, assistant professor of sculpture, said.

The sculpture department is designed to give more guidance to students in the lower-level classes and less guidance and more individual work in the more advanced courses, Hunt said.

"We work individually together to develop ideas for what they want," he said.

The more advanced classes are set up to give more freedom to the students, and only to provide guidance when an obstacle arises. Hunt said he allows for the independence necessary to create original designs. Kevin Rutherford, senior in sculpture, said.

The amount of time taken to complete each project differs for each individual and is based on the size, materials and previous sculptural knowledge. Hunt said the level of difficulty varies greatly, depending on the artist.

"I spent three or four months making mine," Rutherford said. "It was hard work to make it, but I wouldn't make a piece that I didn't find challenging."

Rutherford also said that while he has a specific intention for the piece's meaning in mind, he doesn't believe that it is necessary for others to interpret it like him. Each piece should be looked at and seen as whatever the person who is viewing it wants to see, he said.

Matt Lyczak, senior in sculpture and ceramics, contributed two pieces of work to the exhibit. His first piece was entitled "Built on Love" and depicted children's building blocks. The blocks are arranged to spell various words: "hate," "hell," "kill," "war" and "die." Around the bottom block is the word "love." He said his purpose was to take seemingly innocent children's toys and make them more sinister to show that the world isn't all that good.

"My idea was to use the blocks to reflect that each of these word's meanings are taught at a young age," Lyczak said. "Parents are teaching kids this because they think it is the right thing to do, even though it is not."

Another addition to the sculpture display is that of Brook Edgington, senior in sculpture and ceramics. She titled her piece "28 Days." The idea originated from looking through an old biology sketch of the female uterus and ovaries, she said.

Her intent was to show viewers that a woman's body is more remarkable than most realize.

"There have been some bad comments about females over the years, but the female reproductive system really is an amazing creation," she said.

Edgington said it is important for people to come to the display not only to see the talent, but also to view all of the hard work that has gone into it.

People need to learn about the variety at K-State. It is not all engineers and architects, she said.

"Anything but Clockwork" is Matthew Harbstreit's piece. Working his way through college, Harbstreit, junior in sculpture, was only able to take about six hours at a time, putting him at K-State for more than the traditional four years. With all of his friends gone, he said he feels like he has been wasting his time.

"I decided to make this piece because I feel it represents the time and money I have spent here at K-State," Harbstreit said. "I really made it for my own personal sanity, kind of like therapy."

It took Harbstreit between 60 and 70 hours to complete this project, and he said it was a relief to finally get it done. One thing that motivated him was critiques from the other people in his class, he said.

"We ask each other's opinions on each new idea we have. It helps to work around others and to use their experiences," he said.

It was while watching the Discovery Channel on television that Hilary Wahlen, sophomore in sculpture, first imagined her sculpture idea. The piece took about two months to finish, and many changes occurred along the way.

"The sea dragon was the most beautiful creature I had ever seen. It was incredible the way it moved through the water," Wahlen said. "I used glass iridescent marbles to give it an eerie, dreamy quality. I wanted it to look like a mystical creature."

Rod Wakefield, senior in art therapy, submitted two pieces of work to the display. He said he was first attracted to sculpture because it involved art as objects. The goal of making any artwork is to have it displayed, otherwise it defeats the purpose, he said.

"It is a long process and very time consuming. You put so much work into something, and to be pleased with the final product is a nice feeling," Wakefield said.

The artwork titled "Expectations," which is a metal doorway, began as a mere accident, Chad Fonfara, graduate student in sculpture, said. While making another piece that didn't work out he said he found something with a little more relevance to people.

Although in the two months it took to construct the doorway many difficulties arose, Fonfara said he was glad the project kept his mind occupied.

"People pass through doorways everyday, and what happens in those rooms affects our whole day," he said. "I wanted to take the mundane, what we don't usually see, and isolate it."

Fonfara agreed that the theme of this exhibition was to display a part of the university that isn't readily seen. People see the school as a business and agriculture school, and they should be aware that there are visual arts going on, he said.

Lyczak also said that the importance of the show was to gain recognition for the hard work and effort being put forth by art students.

"This gives us placement in the university, instead of just being pushed aside to the edge of the campus," he said. "Just like sports have their sporting events, arts have their shows."

XFL eliminates rules, taboos, talent from game of football

When asked what the "X" in XFL stands for, Vince McMahon, executive producer and pioneer for second-rate football leagues, had an appropriate answer.

"Nothing." That's right. The "X" doesn't stand for anything. Which is appropriate, because that's just it. The XFL doesn't stand for anything. Not safety of players. Not importance of strategy. Not adherence to good taste. Nothing.

That sums it up perfectly. When the XFL kicks off Saturday with a scorcher between the New York/New Jersey Hit Men and the Las Vegas Outlaws, it will be one small step for McMahon, one giant leap for absurdity.

The first sign there's trouble for the budding league is that despite giving Las Vegas its first professional (and I use that word loosely) team, not even the people in Las Vegas will gamble on the action. You know, it's bad when the Vegasites are passing up a chance to lay down a little bling-bling on a sporting event. These are the kind of people who would wager on the number of times Trent Dilfer adjusts his jock strap if you give them good enough odds.

Despite the lack of action in Las Vegas, the XFL has promised to bring more action to the game of football by eliminating rules, eliminating taboos and, as far as I can tell, eliminating talent.

Jesse Ventura, current governor of Minnesota and a man under the employment of the XFL, explains that several rule changes have been made to remove some of the humdrum from the "No Fun League" — Ventura's moniker for the NFL.

Ventura argues that fans use the time while teams kick extra points to use the restroom. Why? Because extra points virtually are automatic. The solution? The XFL doesn't allow teams to kick extra points. The teams must go for the two-point conversion every time.

Eliminating the extra point doesn't inject excitement into the game; it removes an important element of strategy. The free extra point is a reward for scoring a touchdown. It's what separates a touchdown from two field goals. The possibility of scoring one point after a touchdown keeps the score interesting. The two-point conversion is used late in games when the difference between one point and two is enormous.

Strategy aside, why would a fan want to stay and watch a team go for the mandatory two-point play when the likelihood of a team scoring the conversion is incredibly low, especially with these second-rate players?

The two-point conversion works in the NFL less than 40 percent of the time, and that includes fake field goals. How many times can we expect XFL teams to tack on two when the opposing team knows it's coming every single time?

Look at it this way: in the NFL, kickers make the extra point 95 percent of the time. The two-point conversion is made about 35 percent of the time. This means that an extra point is worth .95 points, whereas a two-point conversion is worth only .70 points. This is why the inclusion of the extra point injects strategy. Allowing coaches to make the critical decision to go for two is what makes close games exciting.

Even more concerning than the loss of strategy is the elimination of the fair-catch rule. Punt returners cannot signal for a fair catch on a punt, and any punt that travels more than 25 yards is a live ball for both teams. This live ball rule forces the return team to field the ball, and without the availability of a fair catch, it sets the stage for serious injury.

The XFL does show some compassion. The returner is given a five-yard halo to catch the ball, but five yards doesn't translate into much protection. Sure, the fair catch might be boring, but the only thing more boring is watching the medical staff peel players out of the turf after they've been broadsided on a punt return.

I'll be the first to admit, NFL football games have some dull moments. With N'Sync on the sidelines at the Super Bowl, I'm sure Britney Spears scored more often than the New York Giants. Of course, the way the Ravens defense was playing, Ray Charles probably scored more.

Sure, there's something about the XFL that appeals to the pugilistic side of even the most passive of sports fans. I'll probably watch a game or two, but the XFL can't remedy the NFL's ills by damaging important facets of the game.

I'm all for reform.

If the XFL wants to change rules they can mandate smaller outfits for the cheerleaders or force Eric Dickerson to take grammar classes.

The XFL is making an honest attempt to shake up football. Innovation, I can appreciate. Irrationality, I can't.

Hopefully by this time next year the "X" finally will stand for something.

Xtinct.

Death toll rises in India earthquake

By CHRIS TOMLINSON
The Associated Press

BHUJ, India — The discovery of a living 8-month-old baby — covered in his dead mother's blood but cradled in her lap — Monday captured the heart-break and the singular miracles of India's killer earthquake.

The rescue was rare cause for hope following the earthquake, whose damage is now estimated at up to $5.5 billion. India's prime minister acknowledged Monday that his country was ill-prepared for disasters.

In the case of the miracle baby, doctors said the warmth of his mother's body helped him survive three days in the ruins of a collapsed building in Bhuj's Kansara Market.

"We saw the baby in the mother's lap, we saw some movement from the baby," said R.K. Thakur, a Border Security Forces assistant commandant. "I took the baby in my hand, and I found it was alive."

The boy, Murtza Ali, was rushed to a medical center, surviving relatives were found, and the child was conscious and smiling, Thakur said, adding: "It was miraculous."

There are few even partly happy endings in western India these days.

Survivors complained Monday that confusion and a lack of equipment was hampering rescue efforts. Rescuers lacked cranes and bulldozers, and many units did not even have generators, making night work impossible without lights. Soldiers hunting for survivors began work at first light and stopped when the sun went down.

The hope of finding many more survivors "is dwindling hour by hour, but as long as there is hope, we won't give up," said Joachim Ahrens, who represents a Swiss rescue team in Bhuj.

In the first estimate of damage, the Federation of Indian Chamber of Commerce and Industry Secretary General Amit Mitra said quake losses might be as high as $5.5 billion besides a daily production loss of $111 million.

However, officials in Gujarat state, epicenter of Friday's magnitude 7.9 quake, put the figure at $2.17 billion.

What's the damage?

- Magnitude 7.9 earthquake occurred Jan. 26.
- As many as 20,000 could be dead.
- Damage now is estimated at up to $5.5 billion.
- Daily production loss is estimated at $111 million.
- International aid: $5 million from the United States and $12 million from Britain.

How to help

The Indian Student Association is raising funds to help earthquake victims. Those interested in contributing may write checks to: OXFAM, RESPONSE #26. In the check's memo section "Indian earthquake relief" may be inserted. The collecting point is the office of Krishna Lummala, Department of Political Science, in Waters 226.

A grim-faced Prime Minister Atal Bihari Vajpayee, who toured Gujarat on Monday, said he was forming a national disaster agency to ensure immediate response to emergencies.

"The country is not ready to face such disasters," Vajpayee told reporters in Ahmedabad, Gujarat's economic hub.

He also announced federal grants totaling $108 million for the state.

The prime minister noted that when a cyclone killed 10,000 people in the eastern state of Orissa two years ago, his government had trouble responding. He said it was facing similar problems now.

"I'm here to express my solidarity with the Indian people," Vajpayee said. "They are not alone in this."

In New Delhi on Monday, Agriculture Minister Bhaskar Barua appealed to private aid groups for field hospitals, clothing, volunteers to put up tents and prepare and distribute food, and cranes and other equipment.

As recently as Sunday, Barua said it was the policy of his government not to ask for foreign aid. But he said India was thankful for the foreign help it had been offered.

International aid so far includes $5 million in emergency supplies from the United States and $12 million in aid from Britain.

in the Texas Panhandle.

Just walking into work from the parking lot was a challenge, said Barb Elikor, of Sapp Brothers Truck Stop on Interstate 80 south of Omaha.

"I can look out on the interstate and see people traveling maybe 40 miles an hour," she said.

Interstate 70 from Topeka to Junction City was listed as wet by the National Weather Service Monday, but isolated highways in other parts of the state were reported to be snow-packed and icy.

City and university streets are not as much of a concern as walkways.

K-State had treated its streets with salt and sand, and the city had all main streets covered with specially coated salt by Monday night. Those residential streets in hilly areas also were treated, Jeff Walters, city street superintendent, said.

Calcium chloride on the salt will keep water from freezing until it hits about zero degrees, Walters said. Lows were only supposed to dip into the 20s Monday night.

City street crews were out at 3 a.m. Sunday dealing with the ice storm that had passed through the area. They worked until about midday and then were out again at 8 a.m. Monday and worked until evening.

K-State street crews also worked through the weekend and Monday, Randy Slover, maintenance director, said.

Schools were closed in parts of Minnesota and Wisconsin as the slippery conditions headed in their direction. Schools also closed or opened late in parts of Nebraska and Texas.

The same storm piled heavy snow in the Colorado Rockies during the weekend, with 43 inches in 48 hours at Wolf Creek Pass. U.S. Highway 6 over Loveland Pass was closed Monday morning because of ice and drifting snow, police said.

More than 100 avalanches were reported in Colorado from Thursday through Sunday, but no injuries were reported.

The city street crews might have the weather under control, but Walters said he looked forward to warmer weather.

"Send the sunshine," he said. "Bring back that 50-degree weather."

Students mourn crash victims

By KELLY KURT
The Associated Press

STILLWATER, Okla. — Flowers were placed at the school's Spirit Rider statue and Oklahoma State students pinned small orange ribbons to their chests Monday as they returned to class for the first time since a plane crash killed two basketball players.

"It's like you've lost 10 members of your family," said Lori Peck, a freshman who stopped in the Student Union to sign a poster board tribute to the 10 victims.

Eddie Sutton, the school's basketball coach, has not spoken publicly about the crash, which killed two reserve players, six staff members and broadcasters and the pilot and co-pilot. The crash happened in snowy weather Saturday night, 40 miles east of Denver.

As he left campus Monday, Sutton said he finally was going to be able to do something joyful.

"I've got to go and see my new grandbaby be born — something pleasant," he said softly, heading into a morning mist in a long trench coat, his head down.

Sutton's son, Scott, coach of Oral Roberts University in Tulsa, became the father of a girl late Monday afternoon.

Dan Lawson, junior guard from Detroit, Mich., and Nate Fleming, a freshman from Edmond, were killed in the crash.

At the Oklahoma State campus, 10 orange-and-white silk bouquets — the team colors — had been tied to a fence outside Gallagher-Iba Arena.

"Thank you and God be with you," read a small sign hanging over a bright orange rally towel also posted there. "We won't forget."

University officials spent much of the day preparing for a Wednesday memorial for the crash victims.

They also spoke about the university's use of private, propeller-driven aircraft. They defended the safety records of both Beechcraft King Air 200 aircraft that crashed and the pilot, Denver Mills.

Apartment floor buckles

Alyssa Adams, sophomore in architectural engineering, re-examines the ceiling of her apartment that nearly caved in after a party Friday night in the above apartment.

By JAMIE BARRETT
Kansas State Collegian

When Alyssa Adams walked into her Chase Manhattan apartment Saturday morning, she did not expect for her head to nearly touch the ceiling.

Adams, sophomore in architectural engineering, discovered Saturday that the ceiling of her apartment had nearly caved in after a party Friday night in the apartment above. Adams and her three roommates have evacuated their apartment, which has had the living room ceiling cut open and has jacks holding up other areas of the ceiling.

"We have had to move our entire lives," Adams said. "The guys that live above us are not even able to go into their apartment. They had to get their clothes quickly and leave."

Adams' upstairs neighbors, Dustin Lohmann, sophomore in environmental design; Dustin Moore, junior in landscape architecture; Pete Bleser, junior in architecture; and Kevin Schot, junior in landscape architecture, were evacuated from their apartment right before it was condemned. Moore said he had not noticed much of a problem before Friday night.

"We did not realize the floor was dropping at first," Moore said. "I remember talking to a guy that I know is much taller than me and looking him in the eye. Right after that, we kicked everyone out of our house."

Adams said her neighbors have had parties at their apartment before and it never had been a problem.

"We do not think this is their fault at all," Adams said. "They did not have a lot of people over. It was no bigger than any regular Chase gathering. Besides, you should be able to have people over to your house and not worry about them falling through the floor."

Cherie Lastrapes, property manager for Chase Manhattan Apartments, said action is being taken to fix the problem, but she did not have any further comments.

"We have hired a structural engineer and immediate action is being taken," Lastrapes said.

Chase Manhattan Apartments were constructed in 1993 and 1994. Brian Smith worked for the Gene Fritzel Construction Co. building the complex. Smith said Chase was behind schedule due to the 1993 floods.

"It was really rushed construction," Smith said.

"There was inspection during the construction and it was passed every time, but just to the bare minimum. They needed it to get done so they could sell it off quickly and make a profit."

Smith said he noticed many things done to save money.

"There were a lot of penny-pinching things done," Smith said. "The first wall we did was crooked, and we just sheet rocked over it. That was a really shoddy build. The roof even leaked right after it was built. I told one of the guys I worked with that I would only give this place 10 years before there was something major wrong with it."

Moore said he and his roommates are not sure what the actual problem was at this point, but it looks as though it was a sudden failure with the structure.

Mayor Karen McCulloh said she sees the situation as a perfect example of why mandatory housing inspections should be implemented in Manhattan.

"We can't pick and choose who we inspect and who we do not," McCulloh said. "Sometimes, landlords of University to review team travel

By JENNIFER O'NEILL
Kansas State Collegian

In light of the Oklahoma State University tragedy, Max Urick, K-State athletics director, is in the process of reviewing athletic team travel.

A plane carrying Oklahoma State's basketball coach, two players, six staff members and broadcasters crashed Saturday night near Denver.

"After speaking with the charter companies, I have a high level of confidence with the way in which our teams travel, and they have eased any concern that I've had."

Urlick said he's completely confident in K-State athletic coaches being prudent and careful in their mode of travel.

"Safety is our number one priority and efficiency after that," he said.

Urlick said he provides the teams with a list of certified charter services and the coaches can choose which company best suits the particular needs of that team. The charter company hired depends on who

Schools face closures due to enrollment

By JESSICA PITTS
Kansas State Collegian

Declining enrollment in the Manhattan School District could bring changes for the next school year.

"Manhattan is facing a budget fault shortfall," said Bob Seymour, associate superintendent of Manhattan/Ogden USD 383. "We are looking at all possibilities of dealing with the shortfall, and there are ups and downs to all of them."

Seymour said one possibility is looking at the efficiency of buildings and whether one elementary school could be shut down.

"Of course we are going to take that into consideration," he said. "But it is only one option. We definitely have not decided on that option, so we definitely have not decided on a school."

Enrollment is down about 300 students from last year, which means the district is looking to trim between $1 million to $2 million from the budget.

"Much of the funding is per student," Seymour said, "which adds up to a pretty significant number when you look at it. We are going to have to start looking at several

High number of cell phones in area causes problems for users

By DAVID PLOUS
Kansas State Collegian

Many student cellular phone users recently have experienced inconsistent service.

"It's frustrating," Mike Potchad, senior in mass communications, said. "I pay $34.99 a month for this phone that I don't even know is going to work."

Potchad bought a plan giving him 1,500 minutes per month with free nationwide long distance, a plan he said several of his friends were on as well. He said he has trouble getting service on his phone after 8 p.m. and on weekends.

Steve Jones, freshman in preconstruction science and management, also has had problems with his cell phone service.

"It's not just a night thing," Jones said. "I have trouble getting service at all times of the day."

When a phone doesn't get service, too many phones are trying to operate on a particular tower, or the caller is in an area that isn't covered by a tower. The towers make wireless communication such as wireless e-mail and Internet access, as well as phone service that's possible by transmitting the phone's signal through the air.

Southwest PCS, a division of Sprint PCS, operates parts of central and southern Kansas for Sprint PCS.

Kristi Riley, Regional Director of Marketing for Southwest PCS, heads three markets in the K-State area: Junction City, Fort Riley and Manhattan.

One possible cause for the lack of service is that the area has been oversold.

However, Riley said neither of her three markets has been oversold, and she hasn't experienced an unusually high number of complaints.

Riley said a likely cause for the problem is that many PCS users in this area are college students, some of whom bought their phones in other markets, but use them here in Manhattan.

Using a cell phone in a different market than where it was purchased can cause a problem because towers are built to accommodate the amount of sales in that market. If too many phones are in use outside their home area, where they are bought, service problems can occur.

That is the case for Jones, who bought his phone in the Wichita area, but not for Potchad who bought his phone here in Manhattan.

Potchad was told the number of towers in the Manhattan area aren't sufficient to service the number of PCS users in the area when he called Manhattan's Sprint office to inquire on why he hasn't had consistent service.

Riley said there are plans to build a new tower in the Manhattan-Junction City-Fort Riley area in the near future, but no date has been set.

Cell phones part of campus life as owner demographics change

By CHARLIE MORASCH
Kansas State Collegian

Florencia Reyes is on campus daily and never ceases to be amazed by the growing trend of students using cellular phones as they walk to and from class.

"I see people walking around campus talking on their cell phone, and I think they're just saying, 'hey, look at me,'" Reyes, junior in electrical engineering, said.

Reyes isn't a cell phone hater, and she isn't jealous of those who own them. She is a cell phone owner herself.

"I use it for traveling and when I'm home in Kansas City," Reyes said. An increasingly high number of K-State students use cell phones, and area cellular companies have seen the movement firsthand.

Crystal Johnson, retail sales representative at Cellular One Western Wireless and junior in early childhood education, said students make up 40 percent of Cellular One's clientele.

Johnson said one reason why the demographics of cell phone users has changed and now includes many more students is because traditional long-distance methods of calling cards and long-distance companies are now being replaced by cell phones.

"It has changed, partly because our plans have changed to allow long distance," Johnson said. "So instead of using a phone at home or in the dorms for long distance, they get the phone for security and convenience and to call parents and other out-of-state calls."

Jason Nelson, retail manager at VoiceStream Wireless, said he agreed that more students now are cell phone customers and that most of his clients are students.

"I would say about 70 percent are students," Nelson said. "A lot of them are Johnson County kids. It used to be more Fort Riley people, but the numbers of students have grown."

The increase of students using cell phones

2-vehicle collision kills junior Tuesday morning

Adrian J. Polansky, junior in agricultural economics, died Tuesday morning in a two-vehicle accident.

The accident occurred at about 10:30 a.m. Damon Parker, sophomore in pre-professional secondary education and friend of Polansky, said it was a head-on collision.

Polansky was traveling to work in Belleville, Kan., and the accident occurred in Washington, Kan. Parker said Polansky was a state wrestling champion in high school.

"He was my best friend," Parker said. "I just feel empty now that he's gone."

Consumer confidence falls to lowest in 4 years

NEW YORK — Consumer confidence fell sharply in January to its lowest level in four years, driven down by growing fears of a recession, an industry group said Tuesday.

The Consumer Confidence Index dropped more than 14 points to 114.4, the lowest level since December 1996 when it was 114.2, the Conference Board reported.

The decline in confidence raises new worry about the fragility of the economy, with consumers decidedly more pessimistic about business and employment conditions, said Lynn Franco, director of the Conference Board's Consumer Research Center.

"Since apprehension leads to caution and cautious consumers spend less than the confident ones, confidence levels in February will be carefully watched," Franco said. "Further erosions in consumer confidence will create more serious concerns about the overall health of the economy."

But economists noted that consumers continue to view the current situation in relatively favorable terms, with their doubts focused on the future.

The question is whether consumers act on those fears, observers said.

"Historically, when we see confidence decline, we have to watch and see if it shows up also affecting spending," said Gary Thayer, chief economist with A.G. Edwards & Sons in St. Louis.

Georgia Senate votes to shrink symbol on flag

ATLANTA — The Georgia Senate, exhorted by the governor to "seek the salve of reconciliation," voted 34-22 on Tuesday to reduce the Confederate fighting banner on the state flag to a miniature symbol.

The vote and the expected signature of Gov. Roy Barnes consigns to history a flag that some say symbolizes Southern valor but others contend represents the dark side of the Confederacy — slavery.

The bill needed 29 votes to pass.

Students search for diversity

Learning everyone is different is the lesson gained from K-State's first Diversity Week, sponsored by the Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls.

The K-State community has been invited by KSUARH to participate in the Diversity Week. The week's goals are to promote diversity awareness and develop appreciation of others, said Akua Crum, sophomore in psychology and multicultural assistant of Ford Hall.

"Diversity Week is nice because this is a week to bring all races together," Crum said. "This week is for everybody."

Diversity Week began Monday with the "Picture This" activity. The activity included looking at pictures of a variety of people and making assumptions about the people.

"It is really interesting seeing the assumptions people have on others just by looking at pictures," said Beck Schippers, senior in secondary education and multicultural assistant of Goodnow Hall. "No one really experiences or thinks about someone different unless they're asked to."

On Tuesday, multicultural assistants presented a "Diversity Scavenger Hunt" activity. The scavenger hunt focused on mingling, meeting and learning from others.

Ben Sims, junior in elementary education, carried a card that read, "Find someone who knows somebody with a learning disability." Sims had to scan the room until he found someone pertaining to his card.

"The scavenger hunt enabled us to meet others and realize the things they know about diversity," Sims said. "This is a good thing because those with different backgrounds can learn things about others."

K-State offers a lot to students who never have been exposed to much diversity, said Barrett Singular, freshman in animal sciences and industry.

"Coming from a small town, the first thing I noticed about K-State was its diversity and the variety of people here," Singular said. "It's different at K-State, and coming from a small town with no diversity gets old."

Recognizing diversity includes accepting things such as race, age, abilities, sexual orientation and religion, Sarah Bailey, senior in speech communication, said.

"Diversity means a lot of things," Bailey said. "Bringing about diversity awareness is essential to having an inclusive environment."

The Department of Housing and Dining Services hopes to make Diversity Week an annual event at K-State, Kathy Denney, coordinator of Diversity Week, said.

"Education is the key to diversity," Denney said. "It is important to realize that diversity is everywhere, even at K-State."

Investigators search wreckage for cause of OSU airplane's crash

By NICK WADHAMS
The Associated Press

STRASBURG, Colo. — Aviation investigators are checking whether a faulty transponder played a role in the fatal crash of a plane carrying members of the Oklahoma State University men's basketball team.

John Hammerschmidt, head of the National Transportation Safety Board investigation team, on Monday said traffic controllers didn't get altitude data for the Beech King Air 200's last moments of flight, indicating the transponder might not have been working.

That could point to problems with the plane's electrical system, NTSB investigator Robert Benzon said.

"Maybe the transponder broke or the electrical system that powered the transponder was not functioning properly," Benzon said.

Aviation investigators said they have found no evidence that engine failure caused the plane to crash shortly after taking off from Jefferson County Airport on Saturday, killing all 10 aboard.

They also said small pieces of the plane had fallen to the ground before the crash, but after two days of scouring the site, the cause remained unknown.

There were two Oklahoma State basketball players and six staffers on the plane when it crashed and burst into flames in a field 40 miles east of Denver. The pilot and co-pilot were also killed.

Investigators also have considered whether bad weather caused the crash — the plane took off in light snow and with a visibility of one mile, while an icing advisory warned of a light to moderate threat.

The plane wasn't de-iced before taking off, but there wouldn't have been much reason to do so because the plane went from a warm hangar straight to the runway and took off quickly, said Robert Benzon, another member of the investigation team.

Air traffic controllers told the NTSB they saw no sign of ice or anything out of the ordinary as the plane passed before them.

Witnesses said the plane climbed and banked hard to the right before it crashed. They told investigators the propeller plane's engines revved and eased several times before the aircraft went down.

Accessibility of Forum Hall worthy project

There was supposed to be a meeting Monday to determine if excess privilege fee revenue that was proposed to help fund a student activities center should fund the improvement of the Union Forum Hall.

However, the meeting was canceled, which gives us the opportunity to encourage the Privilege Fee Committee to allocate the funding to Forum Hall improvements.

Since the activities center failed, it is important that the privilege fee money benefit a building on campus.

The hall is not easily handicapped accessible. Even though it is possible for someone who is disabled to get into Forum Hall, it is difficult for them to do so. Forum Hall is a vital part of the K-State Student Union, and it is not too much to ask to make it easier for everyone on campus to experience the programs there.

With the funds available, it makes sense to have this particular section of the Union altered now.

Students voiced their opinions last semester and, due to the activities center's failure, the leftover privilege fee money should go to something that needs to be changed. Forum Hall is deserving of improvement.

The Collegian's Campus Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on topics relevant to the publication.

Hey, Grady, my roommate and I want to know which hall you live in. We'll pass on the free breast exams, but we will take you up on that free hug you are offering.

Just out of the curiosity, did the writer of "Monkey Boy" just get dumped or something? I am trying to explain this really morbid twist you guys put in there.

So, Keira Mann, I lost my phone number. Can I have yours?

I just wanted to thank Keira Mann for her column in Monday's Collegian. I have now located the hitch in my game.

Party-throwers of Manhattan beware. My roommate scrubs your toilets with your toothbrushes when he gets drunk.

Professor Kellogg, you are the best Spanish III teacher ever. Go special K.

Will somebody please just tell me why I woke up Sunday morning wearing women's panties?

OK, Monday the snow was kind of pretty. Now it's just depressing.

Maybe Joe-Joe on crutches could do an act for the Harlem Globetrotters.

I say panties, she says underwear. Who's right?

Chris McEmore, I've got the perfect job for you. Punt returner in the XFL.

Most K-State students drink zero to five drinks when they party. Except for at Savi Jacks, where 300 shots are encouraged.

To the girl in Earth and Action — I just wanted to say thanks for making our paper harder to write. We all appreciate it.

Question for Thursday: Do you think the residence halls should go smoke free? Why or why not?

Love of the GAME

Football, dating can share startling similarities

I've come to realize two of my favorite pastimes have a lot in common even though they seem like polar opposites. While I was watching the Super Bowl, I realized dating and football are pretty similar.

First, they both could be considered competitive sports. In both cases you're trying to win something, whether it's someone's heart or the championship game. As with any sport, there are some people who take the competitive nature of the game to the extreme. In football, these are the players who take steroids or hurt other people just to win. In dating we call these people home wreckers or players. Dating is not about competing with others or trying to see how many people you can juggle at once. Unfortunately, not everyone realizes this.

In a relationship there is a defense and an offense. Sometimes guys come on too strong and then it's time to pull out the Big D.

First downs are like first dates. They're full of possibilities. You can get denied and stopped at the line of scrimmage or you might gain a few yards. In the dating world this would be the equivalent to being shot down or getting a second date.

Strategy is very important. It's always good to have the game plan ready in advance. The worst dates are the ones where the two of you end up driving around trying to figure out what to do next and coming up with nothing. In football there's no way you're going to win if you don't have the right steps mapped out to get you to the red zone.

You can't win in football or relationships without good communication. If the quarterback can't communicate with his receiver, balls are going to get dropped and passes are going to get intercepted. A relationship without communication is like a national championship game without K-State; it's never going to be satisfying.

Fourth downs are a chance for redemption. When the possession isn't going anywhere, this is the last chance to salvage it. By about the fourth date I usually know if the relationship is going to develop into anything meaningful. If it's close, you need to go for it. In some cases, it's just better to punt the ball away and start over.

Turnovers come when you least expect it. The quarterback thought the receiver was going to be able to catch the pass and run it in, but at the last second, the enemy comes running by and takes over. The same thing happens in relationships. Just when you thought the relationship was going somewhere, you get dumped. The best thing you can do is learn from the experience and keep on playing the game.

A successful series ends in some sort of a score, whether it is a touchdown or realizing all those dates are going to add up into a relationship. Scoring always is a cause for celebration. Just remember to be a good sport and not brag about it to others.

Dating can be a lot like K-State's football schedule. Sometimes you just aren't playing teams who are up to par. Once you know you're making this mistake, you've figured out half the solution. Fortunately, when you realize the teams you're playing or the people you're dating aren't even worthy to be competing in the sport, you can move on to a better league where the game is of higher quality.

Injuries can take you out of the game. In football, a broken limb can cause you to sit out for the remainder of the season. As far as love is concerned, a broken heart can put you on the sidelines for a while, too. With plenty of time and rehab, you can overcome the injuries and be right back in the game like a champ.

I personally think professional football and dating both place too much emphasis on money. Some football players won't sign with a team unless there are multi-million dollar contracts involved with lots of perks. Likewise, some people feel a date isn't a good one unless they're wine and dined every time they go out. Athletes should play the game for the love of the sport. People should go out on dates because they enjoy the company of the person they're with. Once money becomes an issue in either realm, things tend to go sour.

There is one way I wish dating were more like football. When the relationship is over it would be so much easier to just slap the other guy on the rear, tell them "good game" and then walk off the field.

AUSTIN PORTER/Collegian

Tips, tricks available to aid those wanting to travel

My first memory of Czechoslovakia. Ah, let's see. A quite violent one. Bill Murray bursting through the border in a militarized recreational vehicle trying to spring his unit free in "Stripes."

That was the '80s, before the Velvet Revolution freed the country from the Communist grip. Now, 11 years and one split later, the country exists as Slovakia and the Czech Republic, two separate and sovereign states.

In a few short days, I will head for the once-Communist state of the Czech Republic. Although I won't have John Candy there waiting for me, I'm really excited about going.

I didn't have quite the long term planning some students have, so I ended up making the decision rather late.

Four score and seven days ago, I decided to depart K-State. Now, almost three months later, I find myself answering the deluge of questions from interested parties while preparing to fly away.

Here's a checklist to help any of you out there who might want to study abroad in the future.

You should start sooner than I did. Most deadlines for summer 2001 and fall 2001 rapidly are approaching if they already have not passed.

First, get a passport. Here in Manhattan they are quite simple to obtain. Proceed directly to the passport office inside the Manhattan post office at Fifth and Leavenworth streets. Cost: $60, but it is good for 10 years. Smile for the camera, lest you look like a terrorist.

Second, decide which country meets your needs for a specific program of study and determine what language skills you will need when you arrive. In some cases, English will do you just fine, even in non-native English speaking countries. For decisions on what courses and country you will want, proceed directly to International Programs Office, third floor of Fairchild Hall. Cost: $0, but it will take some time to make the decision.

Third, do a comparative budget pitting the finances required for a K-State semester against one abroad. You should find that the cost to study abroad is about a $1,000 more expensive mostly because international plane tickets aren't required to study here in Manhattan and they will set you back a few Franklins.

Once you decide to go, there are a few more things you'll want to check into. An International Student ID card can be obtained at the Union Program Council Office, third floor of the K-State Student Union. Cost: $22, but this card will save you much more than that on your airfare alone. For the first-time traveler, it is a must purchase.

Also, make sure to schedule a visit to get required immunization shots for the countries that you will travel. The cost of the shots is variable, but obtaining the shots is easy at Lafene Health Center. I chose to have hepatitis A, hepatitis B, typhoid and a polio booster. If you are scared of needles, try looking away or toughen up.

Finally, you need to tie up the loose ends here at home. Make sure to see all of your family and close friends. Secure a place to live when you get back. Meet with your department head before you go to make sure the courses you take will transfer. And, last but not least, if you are traveling in the spring, finish your taxes.

Uncle Sam might be looking for you when you return if you don't.

There is truth in every cliché. Parting is such sweet sorrow. As burned out as the phrase might be, it still rings true. I'll be saddened when I leave.

It will be five long months without being forced to drink Pepsi, shark for a parking spot or live the "vida loca" at spring break. I won't be driving a car, and I'll miss all of the trees bleeding with campaign advertisements. Peanut butter will become a delicacy, while pork dumplings plentiful.

On Feb. 11, I will be gone in physical presence, but not in spirit.

Though the bells of Anderson Hall no longer will toll in my ears, I will continue listening.

I will change, but the thought doesn't bother me.

If you always do what you always have done, you'll only have what you have now. I'm looking for something different. Praha, here I come.

Zac is a senior in engineering and political science. You can e-mail him at zac3480@ksu.edu.

Action needed to halt Ashcroft's affirmation

Editor,

My previous letter-writing efforts in reference to Sen. John Ashcroft have not been published in the Collegian. Perhaps this was due to the interesting piece published by your opinion editor. However, I have additional information I would like to share with the K-State community.

When George W. Bush became president, Democrats lost their brief control of the Senate, and the Judiciary Committee gavel was returned to Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah. It came as no surprise that Hatch's first action as chair was to try to rush a committee vote, even though Ashcroft still has not responded to a number of senators' written questions. Hatch's effort was thwarted by Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., who tabled the vote until this week.

This is the time to call the members of the Judiciary and express your opposition to Ashcroft. They need and want to hear from you so they can gain a good understanding of public sentiment.

Here are the phone numbers of several important Judiciary Committee members:

Sen. Orrin Hatch, chairman: (202) 224-5251
Sen. Patrick Leahy, ranking member: (202) 224-4242

Sen. Sam Brownback: (202) 224-6521

Sen. Maria Cantwell: (202) 224-3441

As our nation's chief lawyer and principal enforcer of federal civil rights, the attorney general must be filled by somebody beyond reproach: a person of integrity and good judgment.

Ashcroft is a right-wing conservative with an exceptionally poor civil rights record and an astonishingly bad history concerning reproductive rights. I feel we as citizens of the United States are morally bound to prevent this enemy of our Constitution from being appointed as the U.S. attorney general.

Thank you for taking advantage of your Constitutionally protected rights and take action.

Doctoral students from K-State face good job prospects

By OLENA NIKOLAYENKO
Kansas State Collegian

More than 40,000 students earn doctoral degrees from American universities each year.

No more than half of those students will become faculty, and most will not find jobs at research universities. Yet doctoral programs continue to train students to be research faculty, according to research at the University of Wisconsin-Madison.

Doctoral candidates in 11 arts and sciences disciplines at 27 universities, including Harvard, Stanford and Princeton, answered the 20-page Madison-Wisconsin survey. More than 44,000 people participated.

K-State was not on the list of the universities under research.

Representatives from K-State departments are optimistic about job prospects for recent doctoral graduates.

"Our doctoral students have a fairly good record of finding a job," said Sue Zschoche, director of graduate studies in the Department of History. "They had to be persistent, but they landed on their feet."

There is good news for recent graduates.

"Academic job market has been good due to a generational turnover," said Leonard Bloomquist, director of graduate studies in the Department of Sociology.

"Faculty in sociology who were hired in the late '60s and '70s are now coming to retirement."

The overwhelming majority of doctoral students still prefer faculty careers upon the completion of their studies.

"Many students come into the program with the expectation or at least the hope that they will become professors themselves," Zschoche said.

This trend is present across disciplines.

"In the last two years, 11 Ph.D. students in sociology graduated," Bloomquist said. "All but one are working in a college teaching job."

Brenda Fergen, doctoral graduate in sociology, took an administrative research position at K-State.

"I enjoy the work, the flexibility of working part-time from home, and the periodic interactions with colleagues at KSU," she said.

Non-academic job market looms large for doctoral students.

"Given that the academic job market for Ph.D. economists is not growing as fast as the markets for non-academic jobs, it is no surprise that graduates of Ph.D. programs in economics, including our Ph.D. program, may end up choosing non-academic employment opportunities," said Yang Ming Chang, associate professor and director of graduate studies in the Department of Economics.

"Recent Ph.D. graduates have found jobs at government agencies and at research and consulting companies," he said. "They are employed by the U.S. Department of Agriculture, the Kansas City Federal Reserve, the Kansas Department of Transportation and the Texas Labor Force Commission."

In the long run, a choice of employment opportunities hinges upon outstanding job-hunting techniques of a doctoral student.

"It is of vital importance that one knows how to market oneself and make known all skills and interests a candidate may have," Sandra Alvarez, doctoral student in sociology, said.

Local chiropractor found calling by accident

By CRISTINA JANNEY
Kansas State Collegian

When Mark Hatesohl graduated from high school in the small community of Linn, Kan., counselors were telling students to go into engineering or accounting.

He enrolled in college and signed up for classes in both areas but wasn't sure what an engineer did, and the accounting classes were boring.

A visit to his hometown chiropractor after a traffic accident gave him inspiration.

"I was looking for a major, and it found me," he said.

Hatesohl changed his classes to chemistry and biology and went on to chiropractic school. He has been a practicing chiropractor for 17 years, most of which have been in Manhattan.

"I like the fact that I can make people feel better," he said. "I can help some people who have been having problems for a long time. That makes me feel good."

Julie Kirmer, a certified chiropractic assistant, works for Hatesohl and chiropractor John Wheeler at the Chiropractic Family Health Center on Hylton Heights. She said Hatesohl is very attentive and caring toward his patients. She said he makes hours in the evenings and on weekends to see patients, but he manages to maintain a balance between work and his family life.

One of his longtime, elderly patients did not show up for an appointment, chiropractor John Wheeler, Hatesohl's associate, said. Hatesohl learned she was in the hospital, so he sent her flowers.

"He just went that extra mile to check up on her personally," he said.

There has been a long-standing conflict between the medical and chiropractic fields, Hatesohl said. Medical doctors argued there was no proof the chiropractic practice worked. Until the 1970s, members of the American Medical Association were not allowed to refer their patients to chiropractors.

Thirty years of research has helped change these views and attitudes, Hatesohl said. He said he regularly gets referrals from medical doctors. However, these tend to be some of the worst cases that have been resistant to other means of treatment.

"I have people who take five minutes to get from the front door to here," he said.

The longer between an injury and treatment, the longer it will take to treat the problem, he said.

"We need to look for more natural ways to solve problems instead of a pill for everything," he said.

Hatesohl said he would much rather see patients for regular wellness visits. Patients come in for adjustments every two weeks to two months to maintain health.

"The body will heal itself if you give it a chance," he said.

Besides eating right and reducing stress, Hatesohl said there are three things people can do to improve their health.

working in the COMMUNITY

Who: Mark Hatesohl
Position: chiropractor

First, Hatesohl said, he recommends people get their spine straightened out. Secondly, he said he recommends to stop doing things that will get it out of alignment like bad posture, sleeping on your stomach, talking on the phone with your head tilted and lifting things incorrectly or that are too heavy. Lastly, he said he recommends taking preventative measures, such as using supports in your shoes, special pillows, back supports in chairs, and perhaps, most importantly, regular exercise.

"That is regular organized exercise," he said, "not just walking around campus every day. You need action in those bones. It is just the death of people to sit around studying or in class all day."

Some people who have heard horror stories about the chiropractic practice are a little bit nervous about the treatment at first, Hatesohl said.

Brute force now has been replaced by a much softer touch. He also has an instrument that looks like a drill that taps on an area to adjust it. However, Hatesohl said he prefers using his hands because he can better feel what needs to be done.

Sophisticated scans of nerves and muscles have been added to standard X-rays as tools for chiropractors to see problem areas.

"There is no reason chiropractic should be painful unless someone shows up in a lot of pain," he said.

Kirmer, who has been treated by Hatesohl, said he is an excellent chiropractor. She said adjustments might involve discomfort for a second, but a release and relaxation replace it.

It takes an average of five to six treatments for complete results, and visits can cost $30 to $60, he said.

Hatesohl said he has been able to earn a living with a job he loves.

"I see improvement. I see miraculous things," he said. "It makes it easier to get out of bed in the morning when that happens."

Blocked shots, poor shooting kill K-State's bid for victory

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

K-State might have played hard enough to beat Nebraska, but, unfortunately for the Cats, the winner isn't determined by effort.

It's the points that matter, and the Huskers just scored more when it counted, breaking an 18-game road-losing streak with a 63-61 win over K-State on Tuesday night.

"I'm satisfied that they gave the kind of team effort they needed to give in order to give themselves a chance to win," head coach Jim Wooldridge said, "but we didn't make enough shots."

From the way the Cats played in the first half, though, it looked as if the game might not even be close. K-State left the court at halftime, leading 36-28, but couldn't deliver the final blow, shooting just 25.9 percent in the second frame.

"When we had a 10-point lead, I think we should have just went on ahead and kept doing the things we were doing and not let up and just grab them by the throat and take advantage," point guard Larry Reid said.

While K-State's second-half shooting was dismal, the numbers before the break weren't exactly stellar, either. The Cats shot just 38 percent in the first period, but they did take advantage of the opportunities given to them. For instance, K-State created 12 points off of Husker turnovers. The Cats' big men also got into the action, outscoring Nebraska in the paint 18-8.

In the second half, though, all of those numbers were reversed.

"I think we probably slacked off a little bit on offense, not getting the ball in transition, quick shots, and that stuff we were getting in the first half," Reid said, "and in the second half we just kind of slowed it up and fell back and tried to rely on the lead that we had."

Not all of the Cats' missed shots can be blamed on poor shooting, though. Seven times players had layups swatted away by Nebraska center Kimani Ffriend.

Several of those blocked shots, however, might have been called goaltending on another night by another official. Such has been the case in the past for Ffriend.

"It's about time I got some going my way. I've had a lot of goaltendings," Ffriend said. "I went up and got the ball. There might have been one I think might have been a goaltending, but God just gave us a favor this time."

The favor, however, didn't go to K-State. When Reid took K-State's second-to-last shot with eight seconds remaining, the ball might have been on its way down when Ffriend blocked it, Reid said.

"I thought it was a goaltend. I put it up high as I could to get it over him, and the only way he could get it was when it was coming down," Reid said.

Still, Reid said that's just part of the risk in penetrating against a shot blocker.

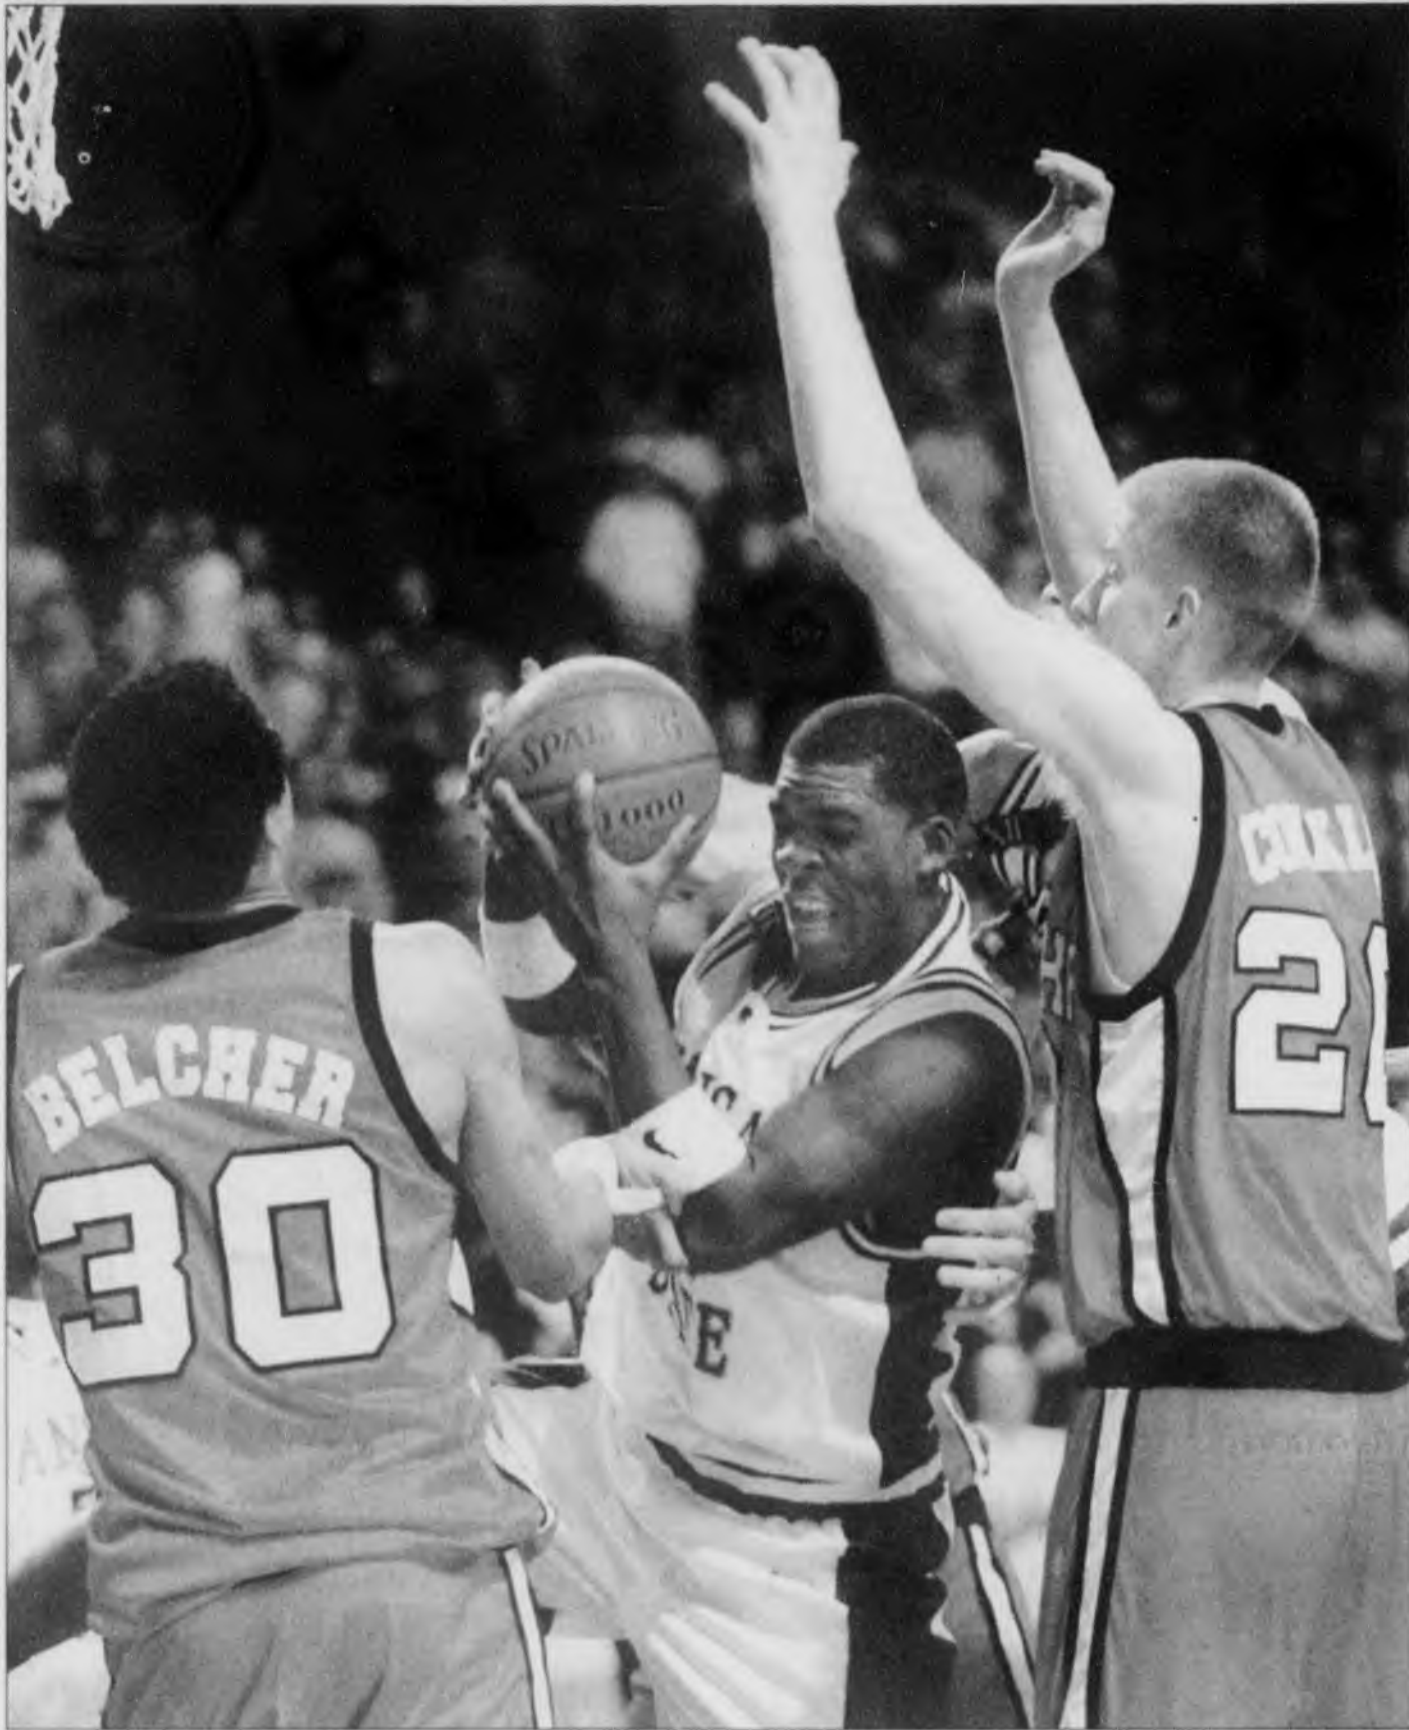

"Going in, you know it's a potential block in there, so you've just got to shoot it and hope if he blocks it and you're shooting a layup, hope you'll get a call or hope you finish," he said.

Ffriend's effectiveness might have decreased if Howell had been able to play in the game's final minutes, but the K-State center fouled out with 11:45 remaining in the game.

"It was a big disadvantage," forward Quentin Buchanan said. "He played good defense, just tonight he was getting bad calls. We needed his presence on the inside on Ffriend, and we needed his offensive game, too."

Even without Howell, K-State still had open looks at the basket that could have resulted in much-needed buckets. The Cats just didn't make them.

"We had open looks, and we should have hit them," Reid said.

Cats lose 2nd straight home game in final seconds against NU

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

If K-State continues to run out of gas down the stretch, the fill-ups at the station might get a bit pricey for head coach Jim Wooldridge.

After dropping their previous home game to Oklahoma on a late offensive collapse, the Wildcats did much of the same Tuesday night as K-State failed to score in the final 3:13 in falling to Big 12 foe Nebraska, 63-61.

As a result, Wooldridge might have a right to feel frustrated with the Cats' last-second misfortunes. He certainly expressed it after the game.

"I'm frustrated — I'll be the first one to tell you. I'm real frustrated," Wooldridge said. "And I think it's pretty obvious why I'm frustrated."

"We've got to do better. They gave themselves a chance tonight and just didn't make the plays down the stretch."

In fact, K-State failed to score on its last seven possessions in the final three minutes, with its last two shots sent in the other direction by NU's Kimani Ffriend.

The 6-foot-11 Husker center blocked attempts by Larry Reid and Richie Terry in the waning seconds to prevent the Cats from avenging their late-game drop off against the Sooners just 10 days before.

"It's getting frustrating," forward Travis Reynolds said. "We're right in the games at the end, right where we want to be, and we've just got to finish the game off."

"I think we know how to win the game. We've just got to do it."

Ffriend's last-second blocks might have been near-goaltending violations, but Reynolds said K-State shouldn't have been in that kind of position in the first place.

"It was a questionable call. If we get that call at the end, maybe we win the game, maybe we don't, but it shouldn't have come down to that," Reynolds said. "We should have made plays the last five minutes to have a comfortable lead when it got down to the end, but we didn't."

In turn, that lack of execution late in the contest leaves a coach searching for answers, Wooldridge said.

"It was a really disappointing loss. It's hard to explain some of the things that happened, but we didn't make the plays down the stretch we needed to, and because of that, we came out on the short end," he said.

"We made enough shots and free throws to make it a game in the last couple of minutes and then we just weren't the better team in the last two minutes of the game."

"They were, and we weren't."

Nevertheless, Reid said it's vital the Cats don't let their falterings in back-to-back home losses linger throughout the season, especially since the squad has a trip to Ames, Iowa, on tap for this weekend.

"You can't dwell on the past. We've just got to come out working harder and move on to the next game," Reid said.

"It's frustrating losing again at home by one or two points — it just hurts — but we've got to overlook this now and look toward Iowa State."

Women's coach remains confident about team despite 1-6 record in Big 12 Conference play

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

Women's basketball head coach Deb Patterson does not get frustrated.

Even after back-to-back losses to conference opponents Missouri and Kansas by a total of eight points, Patterson refused to use the word "frustration" to describe her emotions.

"I think you can't get frustrated," she said. "You have to keep plugging away, you have to keep your focus on what you're not doing well enough and commit your time, communication and work toward it."

"Our players are competing hard, and that's key."

Despite the Cats' rocky 1-6 conference start, Patterson remains confident her team can compete tonight against No. 12 Texas Tech in Lubbock.

The Raiders boast the best record in the Big 12 but are coming off a tough loss Sunday at the hands of Oklahoma.

"The challenge will be great, but I like our matchup against them if we're taking care of the ball and scoring," she said.

"Defensively, I feel very good about our ability to contain their penetration, and I think we have the post bodies to match up, but the question is, 'Will we stay physical and fundamental?' and that's going to be critical."

Containing the penetration of Tech guards Jia Perkins and Katrisa O'Neal could prove easier said than done for a

PATTERSON

Wildcat defense that has been less than spectacular in its most recent outings, allowing its opponents to shoot an average of 42 percent from the field.

Perkins and O'Neal combine to score 25 points per contest, and the post is occupied by sophomore Planette Pierson, who averages 13.6 points and 7.6 rebounds for the Raiders.

Another intimidating number the Cats will be facing tonight is 39, as in Texas Tech's home winning streak.

The Red Raiders maintain the second-longest streak in Division IA women's basketball, including 34 straight over Big 12 foes.

The Cats' dismal start has taken its toll on a number of K-State players, including senior guard Kim Woodlee, who posted just six points in the Cats' latest loss to Kansas on Saturday night.

"I see desperation in our team. I think we're losing because of the same reason," Woodlee said. "When we make an improvement somewhere else, we slip somewhere it seems like, so we need to understand the magnitude of each possession and pull that together as a young team."

"We can't take a play-off."

Patterson said tonight's game against Texas Tech represents another opportunity for her young team to come together as a unit and gain experience, something, she said, that comes with time.

"When you have a young ball club, you never know when all the pieces will fit together, but you've got to stay the course," she said.

"This coaching staff, and this team will not get frustrated. I think it's just about taking one day at a time and giving it all you've got."

End of football season does not equal lack of sports

Step back from the ledge, sports fans — it's not armageddon, just the end of another football season.

Those of us who set our alarm clocks to catch "College Gameday" each Saturday morning of college football season and deliberately pencil "Monday Night Football" into our weekly planners now must find other, more constructive ways to fill the most impressionable days of our college lives.

Like opening a book.

Those of you who consider sports a waste of time (shame on you) know who I'm speaking of.

I'm talking about the people who barely made it to class Monday in wind pants from high school and a dirty sweat-shirt that hasn't been washed since the Cats lost to Oklahoma the second time because the Super Bowl (all six hours of pregame festivities included), was the only religious act they experienced on Sunday.

For some football fans, the end of the season marks a new beginning in academic achievement and fulfillment of goals set before the new school year, but for others, Super Bowl Sunday marked the beginning of a nine-month hibernation spent wondering what will happen next year.

Look around in class today, and you'll see new faces, faces that belong to sports fanatics who haven't even seen campus since the beginning of football season. Help them out. Let them know Campbell's now occupies Sbarro's old spot in the K-State Student Union. Let them know they can't drive both ways in front of Anderson Hall.

Then, over a bread bowl of Chicken and Stars soup, discuss more important matters on campus such as the increase in parking meter costs and let them know that K-State does have a baseball team.

DAN SMITH

Yes, rejoice, sports fans, it's the dawn of a new year for your Wildcat baseball team.

Folks, it's not the student activities center going up on College Avenue just south of Kimball, but a new, state-of-the-art baseball field of dreams, so to speak.

The phrase, "if you build it, they will come," comes to mind, however don't expect Shoeless Joe Jackson or Kevin Costner to walk from corn fields in right field at opening day this weekend.

As Manhattan digs out from the latest blizzard to hit the Little Apple, Coach Mike

Clark and the Boys of Summer are anxious to start a new season of Wildcat baseball Saturday, but success this year will be measured in small steps after a 19-32 record last year left a lot of room for improvement. Suggestions, anyone?

"It's no hill for a climber," said my roommate Matt, who will be making his first appearance in class this week.

"They need to give away free stuff and have supermodels do the seventh-inning stretch," he said.

The funny thing is, Matt is serious, and although his suggestions for baseball improvement might not reach the coach, at least it would make for a more exciting baseball buzz around Manhattan.

SPORTS BRIEFS

Wildcat Fan Reward Program suspended due to bankruptcy

From now on, fans have only the excitement of the game to draw them to K-State sporting events. The Wildcat Fan Reward Program, which awarded prizes to fans based on attendance, has been suspended due to the impending bankruptcy of AIM Technologies of Austin, Texas, which sponsored the program.

Under the program, fans were able to earn points with each K-State event attended and then could receive prizes based on the number of points earned. With the bankruptcy, fans will be unable to obtain additional points, as AIM provided the terminals through which fans swiped their cards.

K-State has no plans to continue the program, Athletics Director Max Erick said.

"We were surprised to be notified that AIM Technologies has filed for bankruptcy," he said. "Unfortunately, they will be unable to service the program for us in the future. However, there is no other option at this point but to suspend the program."

Youth to receive free tickets to women's basketball game

Women's basketball games are free for K-State students with an ID, but for one game, the students' little brothers and sisters can take advantage of a similar deal.

On Feb. 3, youths ages 14 and under will receive a free ticket to watch the Cats take on the Oklahoma State Cowgirls at Bramlage Coliseum.

The initiative is part of a national promotion at more than 500 women's and men's collegiate basketball games. The women's Take a Kid to the Game program, entering its sixth year, is sponsored by Regal and Buick and supported by the NCAA.

"The Wildcats want young children to experience what it is like to participate in college athletics and the rewards of playing," head coach Deb Patterson said.

Tickets for the game become available Saturday and can be picked up at the Bramlage Coliseum ticket office. For more information, contact (800) 221-CATS.

Antibiotic use up; experts say overuse of products will lead to resistance

By KECIA N. SEYB
Kansas State Collegian

People living in Japan prefer their steering wheels to be covered with antibacterial chemicals.

Americans do not go that far, but most people who use liquid soap or dishwashing soap are using antibiotic products as part of their daily routine.

These antibacterial products, however, do not necessarily improve health as much as their companies may advertise.

"There are no research studies that indicate people are healthier because they use antibacterial health care products," said Jay Reppert, medical director at Lafene Health Center.

In fact, there are simpler ways to fight bacteria than using antibacterial lotions or hand gels.

"Just good hand washing for 15 seconds removes 99 percent of bacteria," Reppert said.

Since antibacterial substances have been added to many products, including facial cleansers, shampoos and even plastics in children's toys, people might have difficulty finding products without antibacterial substances in them.

Seventy-nine percent of all liquid soaps have antibacterial substances in them, and 45 percent of all soaps do, Reppert said. Still, students can buy products without antibacterials in them.

"You have to be selective, but you can find them," Reppert said.

Consumers might want to use products without antibacterials because of recent concerns that overuse of antibiotics and antibacterial products could potentially cause resistance to antibiotics needed to combat illnesses.

"Even in hospitals and clinics, experts recommend that we don't use antibacterial products. They're not helpful, and they're potentially harmful," Reppert said.

Experts also say that they should only be used in dirty procedures or when there is actually a needle involved, Reppert said.

In antibacterial resistance, bacteria evolve and develop new genes that protect them from being destroyed by the antibiotic.

Experts fear that antibiotic resistance could happen more often if the habitual use of antibacterial products continues.

John Worden, junior in pre-professionals health program, said he has heard of the potential of a growing immunity to antibiotics and antibacterial substances, and that he is slightly concerned with the possibility.

"I never take an antibiotic unless I'm really sick. I usually wait three or four days," he said.

After Worden looked around his house, he said he found that his soap in his bathroom and his dishwashing soap in his kitchen were antibacterial. He said he didn't buy antibacterial products purposely, though.

"I don't go out to buy antibacterial products, I get it if it's cheap," he said.

Carol Kennedy, director of health education and promotion at Lafene, said she thought it was interesting that in the 1990s there were a few dozen antibacterial products.

Now there are more than 700, she said.

Many household cleaners advertise how well they disinfect because they are antibacterial, but there might be a better way to rid a surface of bacteria.

"Hot soapy water is best to clean off the counter," Kennedy said.

Because bacteria acquire new genes, researchers have had to develop new antibiotics to fight them.

"Early antibiotics have had to be replaced with stronger ones," Kennedy said.

"Researchers thought they had already found the strongest antibiotic. They didn't."

Even with the concern of antibiotics becoming overused, companies still put antibacterials in their products because it's a good advertising point, Reppert said.

"It's always been thought that antibiotics should help us be healthier and stronger," he said.

As of now, antibacterial products have not been proven to cause harm or increase resistance to some antibiotics. Still, Reppert said he would recommend not buying them for everyday use.

"We're not gaining from them, and there is reason to suspect they could lead to a problem."

Manhattan shops, schools finding ways to save money, lower gas prices

By NICK BRATKOVIC
Kansas State Collegian

Gas bills in the city of Manhattan are escalating, and everyone from elementary schools to local bars are paying the bill.

"Just like everyone else, we don't like to open the bill when it comes," said Steve Levin, assistant manager at Varney's Bookstore in Aggieville.

Varney's recently underwent a renovation process that increased its size and costs.

Still, Levin said the process is something the store plans for in evaluating the budget.

"When allocating expenses, you kind of hope for the best, but prepare for the worst," Levin said.

Terry Wark, general manager of Porters, Joe's Tap Room, O'Malley's, O'Malley's Alley and Rowdy Troutys said there is really not a lot you can do.

"Well, as the price of gas goes up, we are paying the bill," he said. "We are hoping winter is about over."

As January ends and February begins, schools are turning down the heat in an effort to keep gas costs down.

"We have asked principals and building administrators to turn down the heat in buildings as much as they can," said Bob Seymore, associate superintendent of Manhattan/Ogden USD 383.

Officials with the district said their gas bill has increased from a year ago, and as a result, Seymore said they are working with building administrators to keep the costs of heating down.

"We have to remember that education is the most important thing, and we don't want our children to go to school with their teeth chattering," Seymore said.

In the mid 1980s, Seymore said the district hired an outside consulting group to help reduce energy consumption. The district increased insulation and put in a plan to change out heating filters in a timely manner.

"We wanted to make the units themselves more efficient," Seymore said.

In addition, the district installed additional layers of insulation in new roofs, along with installing more efficient pipes.

"We are kind of at the point now where we have done the majority of the things that we can do," he said.

Seymore also said the district will not know what the exact effects of the cold winter are on the overall budget until the end of the school year.

"It is all really relative at this point," Seymore said. "Whether or not we are over will depend on how things go through the end of the year."

The city of Manhattan is another area which has worked to keep energy costs down. In 1997, City Hall went through a complete renovation and expansion process which doubled its size and increased efficiency.

"We now have computer control over different wings of the building which keeps the temperatures around 70 degrees," said Chuck Williams, assistant director of public works.

Razzle-dazzle style

McCain musical features nonstop choreography

By CHELSEA SCHMIDT
Kansas State Collegian

Murder, greed, exploitation, corruption — this musical has it all. And it's coming to McCain Auditorium at 7:30 p.m. Thursday.

Winner of six Tony awards, Kander and Ebb's "Chicago" is an upbeat musical comedy that displays choreography in the style of Bob Fosse, a style that has dominated the theater genre for more than 30 years.

"It's a very razzle-dazzle type of musical," said Thom Jackson, marketing and development officer at McCain Auditorium. "We are very lucky to get this show."

Set in the 1920s, the musical features Velma Kelly (Heather Parcells) and Roxie Hart (Tonya Wathen), two women put in jail for killing their lovers.

The two cellmates vie for notoriety by coaxing a big shot lawyer and faking a pregnancy, each striving for the ultimate goal of showbiz stardom.

"We brought this in for the students to see something fun,"

Jackson said.

Chicago is loosely based on a book and makes use of nostalgic ideas about the empowered women of the 1920s, Jackson said.

He said one thing that makes this musical different is the choreography.

"The dancing is nonstop, which is very unusual," he said. "They will be dancing everything from the Charleston to the Fox Trot, with the famous Bob Fosse style to it."

He also said the music and selection of songs is very appealing. For example, in "Cell Block Tango," Velma and her prison cell mates sing about why they killed their boyfriends.

Jackson said there is a sense of pity that can be felt for these women.

"If you had lived one of their lives, you would not convict them because you would have done the same thing," he said.

Maria Tsiolis, marketing associate for Troika Entertainment, said the setting and choreography are what set this show apart.

"Even though it is supposed to take place in the '20s or '30s, it still stands true for today," she said. "It is in a genre of its own."

Richard P. Martin, director of McCain Auditorium also said what he thinks makes this musical unique is its elaborate stage craft.

"It's staged in a clever fashion," he said. "It relies much on the story line and the acting to carry it rather than special effects. It's nice when your imagination is allowed some room."

"This musical is about as stylish and contemporary as you are going to see without all those special effects."

Although Jackson said the musical is entertaining to all, he said it is for mature audiences.

"There is a sense of eroticism in this show," he said. "It's all done in good humor as much as you can."

Nevertheless, Chicago lives up to the standards of other feel-good musicals with excellent choreography, music and style, said Jackson, who has seen the musical twice.

"You will walk away with the songs in your head," he said. "People shouldn't miss this one. It's a must-see musical for anybody."

Because of its expense, Jackson said K-State is lucky to get to see the show.

The musical is sponsored in part by the Kansas Farm Bureau.

"Without the corporate sponsors and the student activity fee, this wouldn't be possible," he said.

Jackson said he encourages those interested in seeing the show to buy their tickets early because they are expecting a sell-out crowd.

"It's a very clever show," he said. "I think everyone is going to love it. It's a really up-beat show and a timeless classic."

Martin agreed.

"It is a high-quality, vivacious show," he said. "It has everything you are looking for when you see a musical."

Tale of Jewish family comes to campus Sunday

By JJ DUNCAN
Kansas State Collegian

Records of Nazi persecution of the Jewish population under Hitler's Third Reich are extensive, but not many of those records are detailed first-hand accounts of the terror felt by Jewish families.

"The Diary of Anne Frank," a play based on the recovered journal of a girl suffered through the reign of Hitler with the rest of her family in Nazi-occupied Amsterdam, will appear at 3 p.m. Sunday at McCain Auditorium.

The play details the months of hiding that Frank and her family went through and the toll it took on them.

Recreating the fear they all felt is a challenge for the director as well as the actors, said Greg Johnson, artistic director of the Montana Repertory Theatre.

"It was a situation of constant terror for the Franks," he said. "The actors must go to that place everyday, placing themselves in the mindset of this group of people consumed by horror. That can be very wearing on an actor."

For an actor, the play is set apart because they are playing people who actually existed, said Joanne Klein, who plays Mrs. van Daan.

Klein said the fact that she is Jewish gives her a further understanding of the subject matter, but the full impact of the play is felt by everyone.

Klein said bringing each character to life on stage shows the audience that these people weren't extraordinary, but just a normal family.

"As the play goes on, the audience realizes these are just normal people who don't understand the extent of what's happening to the Jewish people," she said. "Some of the characters you like and some you don't, but they are all in the same situation."

"The Diary of Anne Frank" was selected as a play that showed the resilience of the human character, Johnson said.

The Montana Repertory Theatre tours with a play each year that celebrates the human spirit he said.

Some members of the cast and crew are students at the University of Montana.

The students receive 18 credit hours for touring with the play and their living expenses are paid by the University, Johnson said.

While life on the road can be trying for the company, Klein said she wouldn't have it any other way.

"I love this lifestyle," she said. "I never have to worry about cleaning up my room when I wake up, I get to travel all over the country and at the end of the day I feel fulfilled because we are selling something I love to the audiences."

Johnson said the play leaves an impact on audiences that proves its power.

"It shows the quiet courage and dignity of these people," he said. "The production is never bombastic and shows how the worst tragedies can strike without fanfare."

Campus network down for repairs early Wednesday

By BRYAN SCRIBNER
Kansas State Collegian

Emergency maintenance to K-State's power plant early Wednesday morning will help ensure power outages do not disable campus services.

The maintenance was performed on a transfer switch that, in the case of a power outage, relays campus power from KPL Gas Service to a backup generator. The switch was repaired from about 2 a.m. to 5 a.m.

Fred Damkroger, director of telecommunications, said all campus network systems were unavailable during this period, including cable television.

The K-State-Salina campus also lost network access to the Manhattan campus and Internet.

A campuswide e-mail was sent Tuesday to let students, faculty and staff know of the three-hour period.

Damkroger said it was the only way to repair the electrical problem and still provide good customer service.

Damkroger said K-State telecommunications monitors network traffic carefully. He said most users are not active from 2 a.m. to 5 a.m.

The problem with the switch first came to the attention of telecommunications Sunday morning.

Damkroger said the switch tried to transfer from KPL power to generator power for no apparent reason.

It did not make the switch successfully, and therefore power from each source was supplied to the system.

Winter storms have the potential to cause a campus power outage, Damkroger said.

He said the problem was an emergency and required immediate repair. It will prevent future problems with the campus power supply.

Ashcroft vote goes to floor; filibuster unlikely

By LIBBY QUAID
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Republicans pushed John Ashcroft's attorney general nomination toward the Senate floor Tuesday, and his leading Democratic critic backed off a threatened filibuster, signaling confirmation was all but certain.

While the Judiciary Committee met to vote on the nomination, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy indicated he would not object to setting a time for a final roll call in the full Senate. Still, the Massachusetts Democrat said he hoped to focus public attention on Ashcroft's conservative positions on abortion, civil rights and other matters.

Inside the committee room, Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, chairman of the panel, appealed to Democrats to give Ashcroft the benefit of the doubt.

"All of us, both Democrats and Republicans, know the difference between legitimate policy debates and unwarranted personal attacks," he said.

The committee appeared divided along party lines, although Democrats said it was possible Ashcroft would gain some votes from their side of the panel.

As for the final vote in the 100-member Senate, Democratic aides said they hoped to post more than 35 votes in opposition to the former Missouri senator, whose nomination sparked the fiercest battle of all President Bush's Cabinet appointments.

Senate Republican leader Trent Lott said he hoped for a final vote by Thursday. "He is going to be confirmed, and there'll be adequate time for debate," Lott said Tuesday after meeting with the president.

Ashcroft foes were trying to marshal votes against his confirmation, saying one aim was to send Bush a signal against sending up similarly conservative nominees for federal judgeships.

At least a dozen of the 50 Senate Democrats have announced their intention to vote against the nomination of Ashcroft, a former senator, Missouri governor and state attorney general. Two of those Democrats on the Judiciary panel: Patrick Leahy of Vermont, the committee's senior Democrat, and Dianne Feinstein of California.

Bush, meanwhile, voiced frustration with the continuing opposition to Ashcroft from Democrats and private groups critical of his views.

"There's been a lot of discussion, a lot of debate, a lot of questionnaires presented and answers filled out, and it's time for the vote, it seems to me," Bush said Tuesday after meeting with House and Senate leaders.

Advocates on both sides of the nomination were keeping up the pressure on Capitol Hill. A coalition of religious leaders had a news conference Tuesday morning to denounce what members called religious profiling of Ashcroft, whose conservative Christian beliefs have led opponents to question whether he can enforce laws with which he disagrees.

"I contend he will enforce the law because he answers to a higher power," said the Rev. Rita Thompson of Burke, Va.

Meanwhile, rainy weather prompted the Rev. Al Sharpton to cancel a meeting at the office of Sen. Chuck Schumer, D-N.Y., to discuss opposition to Ashcroft.

Also at work was the advocacy group People for the American Way, which is spending $260,000 on newspaper advertisements questioning the veracity of Ashcroft's testimony at hearings two weeks ago.

The ads focus on school desegregation, abortion and Ashcroft's opposition to the nominations of a black Missouri Supreme Court judge, Ronnie White, to the federal bench and of the nation's first openly gay ambassador, James Hormel.

things to cut — not just one."

Seymour said this is becoming a trend, with two-thirds of Kansas districts reporting a decline.

"The Baby Boomers are done, and people are focusing more on urban areas like Wichita or Kansas City."

Larry Liotta, principal of Amanda Arnold Elementary, said he shares Seymour's opinion.

"It is hard to put a finger on the specific problem, but the district just doesn't have the students coming in. I think that communities grow or shrink, and for Manhattan, it is shrinking," Liotta said.

Liotta said he has seen a steady decline of around 20 students per year at Amanda Arnold.

"It is obvious that we are losing a substantial amount," he said.

Bergman Elementary reflects Amanda Arnold in terms of declining enrollment.

"We have lost about 20 students this year," Joan Spiker, principal of Bergman Elementary, said. "It seems every year we lose a few more."

Spiker said there is a positive side of having fewer students.

"The classes are smaller, and that allows for more individual attention," she said. "However, it does hurt the district. That is an area of concern."

Seymour said the district will continue to investigate the causes and try and come to a solution that fits the situation.

"It is a complicated matter," he said. "The whole district is experiencing a decline, and we just have to find out why."

newer apartment buildings do not understand why their units should be inspected because they are so new. These things can happen to anyone and situations like this just show it."

There is no mandatory apartment inspection law in Manhattan. McCulloh said she hopes the city commission will see this as an important issue.

"I think there is enough evidence that this is important," McCulloh said. "I am sure that Chase Manhattan was safely built, but something like this would probably have been caught earlier in an inspection."

Moore said he thinks the accident was beyond anything an inspection could have found.

"No one is sure what happened right now, but this is far beyond just needing an apartment inspection," Moore said. "We have had a lot of shocks at this point."

Adams spoke with the university attorney, and she said the apartment should pay the moving costs.

"We are not for sure what to do right now, but it is just such an inconvenience."

Moore said right now he and his roommates are relocating to a different apartment in Chase.

"They are moving us to a three bedroom apartment," Moore said.

"One of us is going to be without a room and we are not for sure what will really happen. We don't know when we are going to move or anything. It is all in the air."

PHONES

has annoyed some students who don't use cell phones on campus. Although many are tolerant of students walking on campus while using cell phones, students and faculty alike seem to agree about the level of disruption caused by students who interrupt classes with cell phones.

Nicole McCallop, junior in civil engineering, said her lab partner used his cell phone while they were supposed to be working on a project.

"His phone rang, and he picked it up," McCallop said. "Then he talked for about two minutes, hung up and acted like nothing happened."

Jerome Dees, professor of English, said although he hasn't had a student who used a cell phone during class recently, he can see how faculty members could be disturbed by students using cell phones. Dees also said he would act decisively if his class was interrupted by a cell phone.

"I would stop what I was doing, tell them to take that outside and make sure you don't ever let it happen again," Dees said.

Dees said although he has heard of phones interrupting classes, he believes most students are careful not to let their cell phones ring.

"I would assume that because it hasn't happened to me in five or six years, they're being reasonably considerate," Dees said.

Both Johnson and Nelson cited expanding coverage and lower rates from each of their respective companies as reasons why the numbers of students who use cell phones will continue to increase.

"We'll be switching to digital very soon, and that will provide a lot of options for students," Johnson said.

"We've put up more towers in the area, so the coverage is a lot better," Nelson said. "The better coverage and reception, plus our rate plans, will bring more customers."

provides the best bid. Many people believe charter planes are less safe than commercial planes, but Urlick says that isn't true. He said charter companies are responsible for following the same FAA regulations as commercial airlines.

Tom Gilbert, assistant director of Sports Information, said each team has their own manager that is responsible for making travel arrangements. The K-State baseball team travels mostly by bus to destinations that are between four to six hours away, but they fly commercially to Texas schools. He said the team will be chartering a 50 passenger plane to Baylor University in Waco, Texas, this year.

The volleyball team's mode of transportation is by plane more than bus. For all of the Big 12 Conference games, the team charters an 18-passenger plane out of Manhattan.

They fly commercially to their preseason events while they go by way of bus to Kansas and Nebraska.

Michele Dubert, assistant sports information director, said the women's basketball team charters a plane that accommodates 30 people. This year they have had two commercial flights and plan on going by bus to the Big 12 Conference tournament. She said they will travel by bus when the journey is under two hours.

When it comes to the football team, Urlick said a plane is chartered for virtually every destination. Travel by bus is limited to Nebraska and Kansas.

Gilbert said charter planes are used often because it is the staff's way of trying to prevent missed school days for players.

"Our coach says that he wants his players as comfortable as possible," he said. "Travel is a big priority in our budget, and he spends a good portion on it."

OSU remembers 10 lost in airplane crash

Mourners gather in Oklahoma to remember the two basketball players and eight Oklahoma State staff members lost in a plane crash Saturday.

By JENNIFER BROWN
The Associated Press

STILLWATER, Okla. — Thousands of people gathered at Oklahoma State on Wednesday to remember what was lost in a snowy field in Colorado.

Ten people, including two reserves on the school's basketball team, a popular TV sports anchor and five others in the team's traveling party, died when their small plane crashed 40 miles east of Denver on Saturday.

Students and fans of the Cowboys joined family and friends in mourning the victims.

They placed flowers under the school statue of a rider on horseback and placards on a nearby fence.

Students lined up outside Oklahoma State's athletic complex three hours before a memorial service was to begin. Many said it was time to begin the healing process.

"I think maybe this will start bringing some closure," senior Laura Downing said. "Everyone has been walking around campus lately kind of in a daze."

Downing and fellow senior Ashley May were in line by noon.

"We know it's going to be totally packed," May said. "We want to get in."

Afternoon classes were canceled so students could attend the memorial or watch it on TV. Quinton Harris, a junior, said it wouldn't be the same if he weren't inside Gallagher-Iba Arena for the memorial.

"I really wanted to feel a part of it," he said. "Everyone will hopefully be able to start healing."

Families of the victims and other special guests mingled among hundreds of bouquets of flowers before the memorial service started. Some stopped to write messages on an 8-foot tall board.

Many of the notes, scrawled in the Oklahoma State colors of orange and black, were written to all 10 victims.

Inside the gymnasium were large photographs of those who died — players Nate Fleming and Dan Lawson; sports information employee Will Hancock; director of basketball operations Pat Noyes; trainer Brian Luinstra; student manager Jared Weiberg; broadcast engineer Kendall Durfee; KWTU sports anchor Bill Teegins; pilot Denver Mills; and co-pilot Bjorn Fahlstrom.

They died aboard the twin-engine plane returning from Oklahoma State's game against Colorado. It crashed in a remote field less than 20 minutes into the flight.

"Will, we feel so cheated to have lost you so soon — and yet so fortunate and blessed to have you in our lives," said one note on the message board signed by Julie, Ed, Sarah, Kyle and Holly.

Memorial service scheduled today for K-State junior

By APRIL MIDDLETON
Kansas State Collegian

A memorial service for Adrian Polansky, junior in agricultural economics, will be at 7 tonight in Manhattan at the First Presbyterian Church, 801 Leavenworth St.

Polansky, known to his friends as A.J., died Tuesday morning in a two-vehicle accident.

The accident occurred at about 10 a.m. Tuesday on U.S. Highway 36 in Washington County. Polansky was traveling westbound when his 1993 Chevrolet Lumina hit a westbound vehicle head-on and Polansky's car caught fire.

The driver of the other vehicle also died in the accident. The cause of the accident has not yet been determined.

Polansky, a 1998 graduate of Manhattan High School, was traveling to work on his family farm in Bellville, Kan.

when the accident occurred.

A funeral for Polansky has been scheduled for 10 a.m. Saturday at Zion Evangelical Church in Muden, Kan.

Don Fallon, religious activities coordinator, said an on-campus memorial will not be scheduled. He said the campus is encouraged to attend the memorial Thursday evening.

Tom Marsh, assistant professor of agricultural economics, advised Polansky for a year and a half. Marsh said Polansky was very active on his family's farm.

"He was very dedicated to his work," Marsh said. "He would schedule his classes around work so he could continue to do both."

Marsh said Polansky was an easy student to work with because he was motivated and organized.

"He always knew what he wanted for himself," Marsh said. "Adrian was a very good student."

Deadline for changing password approaching

By THERESA BECKER
Kansas State Collegian

The time to change Unix passwords is here again, and for good reason. The threat of hackers is always a problem when dealing with cyberspace, even at K-State.

Harvard Townsend, director of Computing and Network Services, said accounts are broken into anywhere from once a week to twice a month.

This makes changing passwords important.

Townsend said one way to change a password is through the Internet.

"The easiest way of changing it is on the Web. The real key is choosing a good password, one that will be checked out through the system," Townsend said.

Townsend said most hackers are from off campus, and many are from overseas.

"The ones we can trace are generally from overseas. They are looking for vulnerable passwords and can hop from system to system," Townsend said.

The hackers aren't looking just for faculty or students, but for any password they perceive as being vulnerable, Townsend said.

"It's a mix of both faculty and students," he said.

Choosing a good password is the most important part but also can be the most difficult, Valerie Kindred, junior in animal sciences, said.

"I already changed mine. It's difficult to change your password every semester and have it approved by the system," Kindred said.

Kerry Campbell, senior in chemical engineering, agreed with Kindred, but said it's worth it because of security issues.

"The main concern about e-mail security is that someone could wreak havoc on the system using your name," Campbell said.

TO CHANGE

The deadline for changing Unix passwords is Tuesday. The address for changing passwords on the Internet is www.ksu.edu/password.

Residence hall members turn Webcam into talk show

By ERICA COURTRIGHT
Kansas State Collegian

To be a guest on a live talk show no longer requires a plane ticket. It doesn't even require leaving the Manhattan city limits.

Michael Pule, junior in mass communications, and about 15 other members of the campus organization "KSU Late Nite" have been producing a live Internet talk show from Goodnow Hall since last spring. What began as a single student tinkering with the Webcam on his personal computer has grown into a talk show complete with hosts, a staff of writers, a producer and various guests.

Pule said he and his roommate, Joel Yourdon, junior in pre-professional business administration, were experimenting with the webcam in their room when Yourdon turned the camera on himself.

"Then it hit us. We could do a show," Pule said.

The pair teamed up with a group of friends to produce the first episode of "KSU Late Nite" during the spring semester of last year. Pule said the show is similar to "Late Night with David Letterman" or "The Tonight Show," and it borrows elements from shows such as "Saturday Night Live."

Pule said the show has featured K-State volleyball players, other Goodnow Hall residents and musicians as guests on past shows. Along with guest appearances, "KSU Late Nite" also has an opening monologue, top 10 lists similar to those on "David Letterman" and prerecorded pieces.

Marshal Funk, junior in history, runs the camera for the show, and he said he thinks people living in Manhattan would enjoy "KSU Late Nite."

"The whole thing is just kind of zany," Funk said. "Our focus, in terms of the guests we have on, is local. The guests we have are people known in the community or throughout campus — people we think will be interesting."

Since the first episode last spring, "KSU Late Nite" has aired eight times, most recently Tuesday night. Quinn Krehbiel, freshman in pre-professional construction science and management, appeared on the hourlong show. He played two songs on his guitar, one he wrote and another by Third Day.

The broadcast also included several parody skits similar to those on "Saturday Night Live." There was a news broadcast similar to "Weekend Update" that included discussion of President George W. Bush and John Ashcroft. Funk also produced a parody commercial for a fictitious mental health care provider, Sunnybrook Funny Farm.

"It was just pure chaos," Pule said. "It was hilarious."

The commercial showed people running around and running into walls. There were dogs

University looks to enhance campus in future

By JAMIE BARRETT
Kansas State Collegian

A new master plan is in the making for possible developments to the K-State campus.

Focus groups consisting of K-State students and faculty, as well as community members, have been meeting to discuss changes to the campus, including building expansions, additions of new buildings and parking structures. Jerry Carter, director of facilities planning and university architect, said the focus groups are focusing on the areas of growth that will most affect K-State students, faculty and staff.

"In the development of this master plan, we are actively seeking input from the campus and the city of Manhattan to focus on the areas of concern for campus growth," Carter said.

Carter said facilities planning has hired HNTB Architects, Engineers and Planning to work on the master plan. He said the Kansas City firm has been hired to work with K-State on possible developments over the next 50 years.

"We are not just going to deal with them for the next five to 10 years on this project," Carter said. "We are planning with them for setting the framework of where the campus can grow for as far as the next 50 years."

Kevin King, associate vice president for HNTB, said HNTB is working with the focus groups to develop a plan that will meet the mission of the university.

"K-State has developed a mission to keep the development based upon the university mission of education, research and community outreach," King said. "We want to enhance campus character, provide a comfortable environment, build a relationship with the community, maintain a financial balance and implement some strategies for development."

King said some of the things they are looking at in the planning include enhancing and preserving the campus character with many of the historical parts of campus and also

News of the weird

In December, Yokohama, Japan, shopkeeper Akira Ishiguro, annoyed at shoppers who are "teasers," allegedly made a woman get on her knees and apologize to him because she did not want to buy the coat she had just been handling. Ishiguro had once locked a woman inside the store until she agreed to buy something, and in fact pressured the coat-handling woman into changing her mind and handing over about $25 as a down payment.

Fed cuts interest rate by half percentage point

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Federal Reserve, seeking to prevent the faltering economy from slipping into a recession, cut a key interest rate by another half percentage point Wednesday. "Consumer and business confidence has eroded further, exacerbated by rising energy costs that continue to drain consumer purchasing power and press on business profit margins," the Fed said in a statement.

The decision came after a two-day, closed-door meeting of the Fed's chief policy-making group, the Federal Open Market Committee. The panel includes Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan, Fed governors and five of the 12 presidents of Federal Reserve banks.

The Fed said it was cutting its target for the federal funds rate — the interest banks charge each other on overnight loans — to 5.5 percent from 6 percent.

The Fed, in a rare move between regularly scheduled meetings, slashed interest rates by a half-point on Jan. 3, the biggest reduction in more than eight years.

Against the backdrop of the weakening economy and the fact that inflation, for the most part, remains tame, the Fed said that "these circumstances have called for a rapid and forceful response of monetary policy."

The Fed's half-point decrease in the funds rate Wednesday was quickly followed by announcements from Bank One and Bank of America that they were reducing their prime lending rate by a similar half point, from 9 percent to 8.5 percent, effective Thursday. Other commercial banks were expected to follow.

Daschle expresses hopes for Ashcroft filibuster

WASHINGTON, D.C. — With confirmation virtually assured, the Senate Democratic leader said Wednesday it would be troubling if his party couldn't produce at least 30 votes against Attorney General nominee John Ashcroft.

Sen. Thomas Daschle, D-S.D., told reporters he hoped 41 of his party's 50 senators would oppose Ashcroft to signal the Bush administration that Democrats have the clout to block future nominations. Forty-one votes would sustain a filibuster and block a vote, although Democrats said Tuesday they would not use the delaying tactic against Ashcroft.

Daschle commented as senators debated the nomination, with supporters calling Ashcroft a man of integrity and opponents questioning whether his conservative positions on civil rights, abortion and other issues would influence his decisions in the Justice Department.

Commission stresses role of National Guard

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A "catastrophic attack" is likely to hit U.S. soil in the next 25 years, and the National Guard should be retrained as America's main protector against such an assault, an advisory commission on national security said Wednesday.

The United States also needs to reorganize the State Department, overhaul the Defense Department and invest more in scientific research and education systems that are "in serious crisis," the report said.

"America faces ... new dangers, particularly to the homeland and to our scientific and educational base," said the report's introduction by former Sens. Warren Rudman, R-N.H., and Gary Hart, D-Colo., co-chairmen of the U.S. Commission on National Security/21st Century.

The biggest threat in the next couple of decades, the panel said, is the likelihood of an attack on the United States.

Death toll estimated at 25,000 in Indian quake

AHMEDABAD, India — Rescuers pulled survivors from the wreckage of India's earthquake just before bulldozers began to arrive Wednesday as the government of Gujarat state said 12,000 bodies had been recovered and the death toll was likely to reach 25,000.

The estimate is based on the number of bodies recovered, those reported missing, the estimated number still lying under debris and reports gathered by government agencies, said Haren Pandya, home minister of Gujarat.

Lafene sports doctor strives to give quality care

By QUINN ASPGREN
Kansas State Collegian

He might not don his own purple and white Wildcat jersey, but David Smith, primary care sports medicine physician, is the newest member of the Lafene Health Center health-care-provider team.

The K-State alumnus and graduate of the University of Kansas Medical School took the place of Guy Smith, former director of sports medicine for Lafene, who retired from the program two years ago.

"Our orthopedic physicians helped to provide clinics for sports injury patients, but it wasn't the same type of service that a doctor of sports medicine can provide," said Clarice Holmes, clinic coordinator and registered nurse.

"It is wonderful having an actual sports medicine doctor on staff. I think we'll be able to give a lot more comprehensive care to students," Suzanne Whitesell, L.P.N. at Lafene, said.

Smith and his family recently moved to Manhattan from the Kansas City area, and he started practicing at Lafene Jan. 1. His primary interest as a sports medicine physician has been his continued interest in exercise physiology and preventative medicine. He has been a practicing physician for 11 years.

"I have always had the university itch, and this is my alma mater," Smith said. "I thought it would be neat to come back and help rebuild the sports medicine program at Lafene."

Only three weeks into his new job, it might be too soon to forecast the most common injury among college student patients, but Smith has a strong feeling they mostly will be over-use injuries, including stress fractures and shin splints, or traumatic injuries such as ankle and knee sprains.

Smith said a knowledgeable sports medicine physician is important for not only intercollegiate athletes but recreational athletes as well.

"I challenge the students to come see me and try me out. I think I have very good experience, and hopefully, when they see me, they feel that they truly had a good evaluation of their problem, how to deal with it and also how to prevent it from happening again," he said.

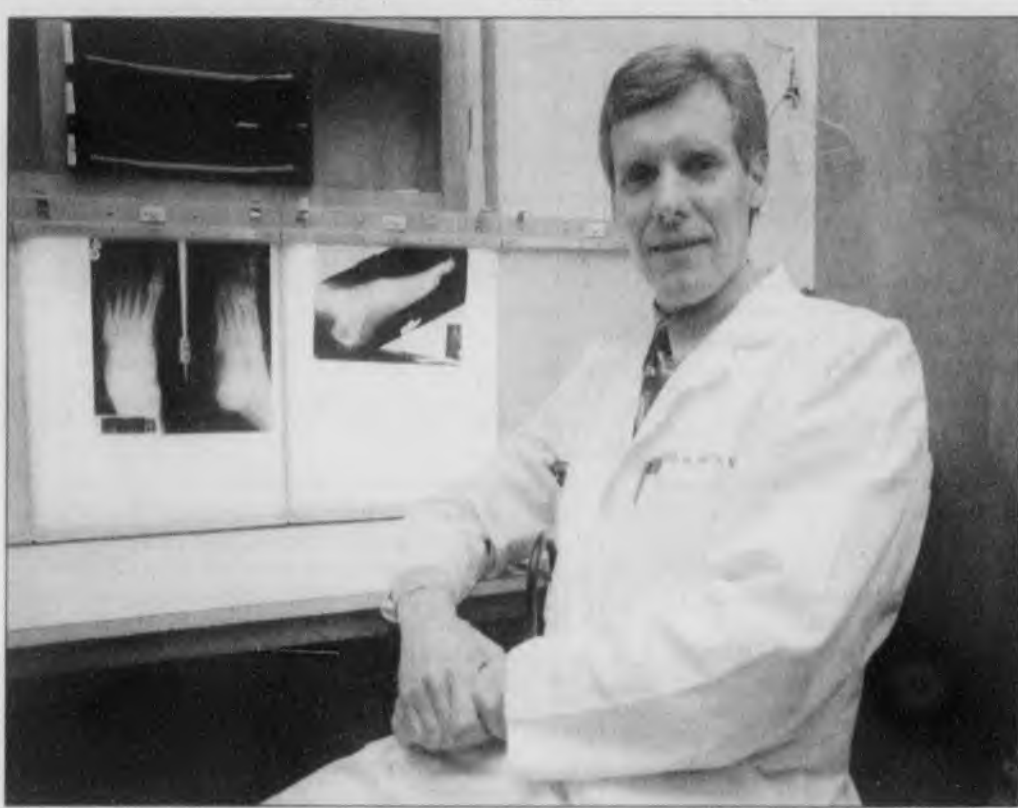

Smith also understands the value of exercise at a college student's stage in life to help maintain a healthy and high quality of living.

"My goal is to keep people active," Smith said. "We can't keep people young forever, but we can keep them active so they can enjoy good health for as long as they can."

With an extensive list of credentials under his belt, such as physician for the 2000 U.S. Women's Junior National Basketball team, as well as the 1997 U.S. Tae Kwon Do team, and service as medical director for multiple sporting events as the Sunflower State Games, Smith has much to offer Lafene and K-State.

"My goal is to keep people active. We can't keep people young forever, but we can keep them active so they can enjoy good health for as long as they can."

— David Smith, primary care sports medicine physician

EVAN SEMÓN/Collegian

Dr. David Smith, sports medicine physician, is the newest member of the Lafene Health Center health care providers. Smith is a K-State alumnus and is replacing Guy Smith, former director of sports medicine at Lafene, who retired from the program two years ago.

"He does have a lot of experience, and he is really working hard to set up good relations with the athletic department. He wants not only the students but the athletes to trust him and feel comfortable with him," Holmes said.

Smith said he practices what he preaches. He enjoys running, competing in triathlons, water skiing and snow skiing. He said he wants to set an example of good health for his son and three daughters.

Debate team ranked 1st in nation, still looking to improve

■ K-State's spring debate team ready to compete, accomplish several goals.

By CAMILLE BOISSEAU
Kansas State Collegian

With a No. 1 ranking, the K-State debate squad still has team and personal goals to accomplish.

The team placed first in three of the four meets it competed in this fall. The tournaments were at Middle Tennessee State University, Wichita State, Johnson County Community College and Wake Forest.

They started the year with everyone having personal goals and also with everyone wanting to achieve overall team success.

Sue Stanfield, director of the debate squad, said she hopes the team will finish in the top 5 or 10 nationally. She said she believes this is possible if the team continues the season in the direction it is going.

"The spring tournaments often are tougher competition than the fall tournaments," Stanfield said. "We hope to stay ahead of our competition and build on what we have going."

Being a member of the debate team is a large time commitment. In the average week a student will spend between 25 and 30 hours working on research, traveling and preparing for tournaments.

Michael Shultz, a member of the debate team and sophomore in political science, is surprised with the debate team's success.

"We traditionally do well, but this year we have a smaller squad, and our success has been a surprise," Shultz said.

Shultz has set his own personal goals to qualify for the national debate tournament and the Cross Examination Debate Association.

Melissa Newton, Shultz's debate partner and junior in speech communication, also has her own personal goals.

"I want Michael and I to remain competitive throughout the rest of the season," Newton said.

Newton said he also has a goal to qualify for the national tournament that will take place in late March at Middle Tennessee State University.

Participating on the debate team is a great way to develop some personal skills, Shultz said.

"Being a member of the debate team has helped me with my public speaking, and writing gave me some familiarity with the library while doing research," she said.

Newton said debate has helped her to develop more critical thinking skills.

The debate team has a lot of tradition to follow.

The junior varsity team is the two-year defending national champions, and the varsity team was national champion in 1991 and 1993.

"The team is currently preparing for a tournament at Northwestern, and wants to compete and maintain their level of success at the tournament," Shultz said.

On the Topic

Should the residence halls go smoke free? Why or why not?

No smoking in the residence halls? Hey put that in you're pipe and smoke it. Oh, wait.

Residence halls going smoke free, what does that mean to me? No more risk of second-hand cancer.

Yes, the residence halls should be smoke free. If I am going to die I want it to be something other than lung cancer. Even though it does make my breath so minty fresh I am going to have to say no.

Why should some have to suffer over someone else's disgusting habit?

Smoking in the dorms? Um, try the roach problem. Why don't you take care of that instead of worrying about the smoking problem?

I think the residence halls should go smoke free. And I think all of Manhattan should go smoke free because smoking is a nasty, dirty, stinky, dirty habit.

The persecution of smokers needs to stop. Relax, we'll find a cure for cancer.

Smoking is gross. Why should the campus support it?

It's about time the rights of the non-smokers have been heard.

Off the Topic

Hey Sarah, great column on the football and dating. Hey, I'd go on a date with you to a football game anytime.

I find it interesting that if you are a minute late for the Biology 198 class you are counted absent and not allowed to take the quiz. Yet they can't seem to get the test grades posted the day after the tests like they say they can.

Is anybody besides me sick of snow and ready for spring?

If you can squeeze them small enough to fit into your wallet, they are panties. Anything bigger is underwear.

I think Kansas State should support the rowing team.

I'm sure glad they handed out those foam noodles at the game tonight. That way the refs could shove them up our ... uh, never mind.

Did anybody else think the refs didn't use very good team spirit when they didn't wear red and white colors at the game last night?

Somebody call the campus police, because we got molested by the referees last night.

I love college, but school sucks.

I paid $60 for my parking pass. Since when did the Rec get to dictate when I use it?

Let's make Saturday, Feb. 10 Towel Guy appreciation day. Bring your towels to the K-State/Colorado game.

Yeah, this is Bill the ref from the basketball game last night. I missed my bus back to Nebraska, and I was wondering if anyone could give me a ride.

I was just wondering if it's still illegal to goal tend in college basketball.

Where's Joe Leonard when you need him?

Losing Napster has made me resort to other online activities. Now I'm a bankrupt eBay addict. Thank you, telecommunications.

To the guy who woke up wearing women's underwear. The good news is they're mine. The bad news is I'm a cross dresser.

Hasn't the Von Trapp family been locked up in the Anderson hall tower long enough? Let them out. Let them out. Let them out.

Question for Tuesday

Should we end the War Against Drugs? Why or why not?

Money hungry

Economic policies mystifying; individual hoarding key to safety

I know nothing about money.

I know when my paycheck arrives (24 more hours, oh, please, God, make with the money already). I know which presidents are on the one, five, 10, 100 dollar bills ... and that's about it. Does this qualify as microeconomics? I don't know that.

When I think about things larger than me and my wallet, sucked dry like Keith Richards in a Dracula movie, to me, that's macroeconomics. Writing a check to Pizza Shuttle is macroeconomics to me. Breaking a five is macroeconomics to me. Trading quarters to get the new New York quarter is macroeconomics to me.

Alan Greenspan, to me, is the goblin king of mega-economics.

I have no idea what happened to the economy. One minute it was stuck in this mad upward spiral like Michael Jordan doing ballet — dot-com companies out every orifice of the fiscal body, rampant spending, the various stock indices adding new digits on alternating days. Then before you can say "Carlton Getz," we're suddenly closer to 1929 than 1999. Or so it feels.

Dot-corpuses line the street. Domain names suddenly are available again. And though there have been rumblings of it for weeks, even months now, the layoffs are really beginning to hammer home. It's not just companies whose wallpaper haven't dried yet who are abandoning cubicles and looking for desks to float on. It's established companies — AOL/TimeWarner, fresh off their unholy copulation (and naked attempt to own Damn Near Everything), celebrated by shedding a few thousand jobs. Who isn't laying off — or at least slashing madly at expenses in a mad attempt to meet expectations? Suddenly, it's a good time to stay in school again (Yay, 11 more years!).

Right now, I can read Greenspan's thoughts, and they're dirtier than Britney Spears' still-live-mike rant. But not quite as perky.

There's short-term solutions in the works already. Greenspan's gone medieval on those same interest rates he kept raising like parking permit fees during the last great boom of, oh, sometime last century. Our new president, George W. Bush (my God, that still doesn't sound right) has been screaming for a massive tax cut since he was in the womb, and it looks like he's gonna get it.

The idea, of course, is to stimulate spending and get this economy moving pronto. That much I get. I understand wanting money in order to spend it (24 hours ...).

It's just as long as a critical component of our economy — namely, oil and petroleum products — remains so much out of our control and reliant upon the whims of the likes of OPEC, I can't get too much worked up about the long-term effectiveness of us trying to guide our own economy.

So I'm preparing for the end of economic civilization.

Overreacting, am I? Unnecessarily apocalyptic, you say? Hey, look, I just saw Art Modell lift the Lombardi Trophy — and the only way that man should even be allowed to touch that hallowed award is if he was getting bludgeoned by it, and even then the trophy should be wrapped protectively in plastic. So forgive me for being a little rattled (Mental note: no more writing columns in morning before coffee).

I'm collecting the finer things in life — Twinkies, slabs of meat, buckets of Lego, electric blankets, hedgehogs, everything for when that catastrophic moment arrives when the paper with a dead white man on it is just a slip of paper. You go ahead and immerse yourself in your financial fortress. I'll be prepared ...

Hey, I'm just jealous because I make less than you just put in the meter. At least I can eat a Twinkie.

Lafene concerned with health of students

A recent student column appearing in the Collegian (Dec. 1, 2000) expressed a concern regarding care received at Lafene Health Center.

Please be assured we at Lafene take every concern or complaint seriously, whether it is received in person, via letter or note, or appearing in the newspaper.

There is a process in place at the health center that includes the receipt of the complaint, review and research including discussions with staff involved, a general medical staff or administrative staff discussion, depending on the nature of the complaint, resolution and follow-up with the individual, if known, who brought the complaint to our attention. Student concerns about your health care service on campus is of extreme importance to us. Please don't hesitate to advise us so we can work to improve.

Because the concern expressed in the column appeared to be about not receiving an antibiotic from the Lafene provider for a sinus condition, we are taking this opportunity to again present information regarding the use of antibiotics and medical practice.

The Sinus and Allergy Partnership, a non-profit organization of three major medical groups dealing with head, nose and sinus illnesses and the Centers for Disease Control, writing in the journal, "Otolaryngology — Head and Neck Surgery" July 2000, Volume 123, in an article titled "Antimicrobial Treatment Guidelines for Acute Bacterial Rhinosinusitis" provides current standard of care guidelines regarding the diagnosis and treatment of sinusitis. The health care providers at Lafene follow these guidelines.

The guidelines for diagnosing and treating sinusitis (viral and bacterial) have changed significantly in the last few years. It had been widely accepted that facial pain, head congestion and discolored nasal secretions indicated a bacterial sinus infection and required antibiotic therapy. It now is known that most colds cause a buildup of secretions in the sinuses by the fifth day of illness, that nasal secretions are frequently discolored and that facial pressure and pain are common during this phase of the illness.

These signs and symptoms are part of the viral symptom complex called viral Rhinosinusitis. Antibiotics do not affect viruses and do not prevent, shorten the duration of, or cure these symptoms. Ninety-five percent of persons with these symptoms are significantly improved by the 10th day of illness and never require antibiotics. About 5 percent of persons with viral Rhinosinusitis will not improve by 10 days and at 10 days 60 percent of these will have developed a secondary bacterial infection. This illness is called acute bacterial Rhino sinusitis and should be treated with antibiotics.

In other words, the same symptoms early on indicate a viral infection (untreatable) and after ten days the virus might have been replaced by bacteria. The conclusion of the experts is that antibiotics are indicated with the above symptoms "if the illness is no better ... after 10 days ... or worse after five to seven days."

In spite of considerable research, there are no medications that significantly improve the course of a cold. Studies on zinc and vitamin C have been inconclusive or showed only a small benefit in healthy persons on a normal diet. Decongestants are generally recommended for symptomatic relief but they have no effect on the duration of the cold nor do they prevent sinusitis.

If a medication makes you feel better while you are having your cold take it, but do not expect it to make you better. Your body's immune system is the reason you recover, and it required time for this system to learn to recognize and destroy the virus causing your cold.

Why have the recommendations concerning the use of antibiotics changed? First, because we now have a better understanding about the signs, symptoms and progression of normal colds, and we know that antibiotics don't change that. Secondly, because overuse of antibiotics has led to bacteria becoming resistant to antibiotics.

The most common bacteria causing sinusitis is Streptococcus Pneumonia. In 1991, 5 percent of strains were resistant to penicillin. Now, resistance is between 30-40 percent. The only way to decrease the rapidly increasing resistance problem is to use antibiotics appropriately. At least seven studies have demonstrated that the most common reason for a person to have acquired a resistant infection was their recent use of antibiotics. The point is, if we use antibiotics when they're not needed or helpful, they might not be helpful when we do need them.

Not all healthcare providers follow the above recommendations. Studies show many give antibiotics for viral illnesses, most commonly because the patient wanted or asked for an antibiotic.

We at Lafene believe it is important to use antibiotics appropriately so they will be useful when needed. It is heartening that we have begun to experience an elevated awareness among K-State students of this issue (See Collegian articles dated Oct. 13, 1999, Nov. 7 and Dec. 5, 2000) and their overall acceptance of our decreased use of antibiotics. We must be prudent in our use of medicine and treatments which could increase the risks of future illnesses and resistance to treatment.

Again, Lafene Health Center is your health care facility. We want to know if there are ways to make it better for you. If there is a concern, please bring it to our attention and we will address it. If you are visiting Lafene for a medical problem and feel you'd like a second opinion from a medical provider, we can provide that for you, most of the time on the same day. If you wish to call personally, you may contact Cathie Barry, director of nursing and quality assurance coordinator, at 532-6544; Dr. Jay Reppert, medical director, at 532-6544; or Lannie Zweimiller, health center director, at 532-7755 if you have a concern to bring to our attention.

Benefits of workshop include discovery of storytelling skills

By SEAN PURCELL
Kansas State Collegian

Teachers, college students, librarians and parents now can improve their skills in the art of storytelling.

Richard Pitts, director of the Wonder Workshop Children's Museum and facilitator of the storytelling workshop, said the workshop will help people express themselves through many exercises that are beneficial to helping people feel more at ease when they tell stories.

Participants will learn how to teach storytelling, while making it part of their everyday lives. Through the workshop, individuals will be able to recognize that everyone has a story to tell, gain techniques that will keep their audience's attention, improve their ability to structure stories and learn how to listen with their body as well as their minds.

The storytelling workshop is from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. Saturday at the Outback Cabin, which overlooks Tuttle Creek Reservoir. Workshop enrollment is limited to 20, and the sign-up deadline is today. Call the Wonder Workshop Children's Museum at 776-1234. The cost is $30 for adults and $25 for students and includes transportation, lunch and snacks.

psychology, said she plans to attend the workshop to improve her communication skills.

"When I am finally in my profession, it is just me and another person, so those communication skills will be important," she said.

Pitts said the workshop will include several activities that should make participants more comfortable with sharing stories in front of people. The workshop then will focus on critiquing each other and refining the skills necessary to tell stories to young children.

"Children in this day and age watch so much television that they aren't allowed to let their minds wonder," Pitts said.

"Storytelling can allow people to express themselves."

The workshop is limited to 20 participants, and the deadline to sign up is today. Call the Wonder Workshop Children's Museum at 776-1234. The workshop will be from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. Saturday. The cost is $30 for adults and $25 for students, which includes transportation, lunch and snacks throughout the day. The workshop will be at the Outback Cabin, a secluded environment outside of town that overlooks Tuttle Creek Reservoir.

Pitts said if there is a big response for the storytelling workshop, he will have another before a storytelling festival in April. Pitts also said that the only thing participants are required to bring is a story. It can be a personal story, a folk tale or a fairy tale.

Ideas welcomed as Kansas legislators explore alternatives to natural gas

By KATRINA HULL
The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Legislators are considering wind-generated energy and asking cities to do their part to address high natural gas prices.

Ideas are being considered to provide relief from high energy bills in the short and long term, said House Utilities Chairman Carl Dean Holmes, R-Liberal.

As natural gas prices have doubled and tripled, some Kansans have asked the state for answers and help.

The Senate and House Utilities committees are answering this week by compiling a growing list of options, some not so popular.

One, opposed by the League of Kansas Municipalities, asks cities to spend increased revenues from fees on natural gas bills to insulate buildings or help consumers with their bills.

"It's mandating how local government would make those choices," said Kim Gulley, the league's director of policy development.

Some cities charge fees as a percentage of a utility bill. As bills tripled, so has the revenue to cities.

"The Utilities Committee takes attempting to find solutions to heart. I pledge this body's ongoing attempt to solve problems."

— Chairman Stan Clark, R-Oakley

"The cities have reaped a tremendous windfall," Holmes said. "The idea is to make citizens realize the cities do have a big windfall."

Environmentalists oppose legislation providing incentives to build new coal-fire power plants.

The House Utilities Committee is considering a measure providing incentives to school districts to use wind-generated power.

Charles Benjamin, lobbyist for the Kansas Sierra Club, said legislators should explore using renewable resources such as wind and sun first.

"We just don't think there's been justification for building more coal-fire plants," Benjamin said. "That's not renewable energy."

Holmes said if plants use coal instead of natural gas to produce electricity, the state could conserve more natural gas and avoid future shortages that drive prices up.

Other ideas, such as forming a state energy office, address planning and prevention.

"This is an opportunity to bring everybody together," Holmes said. "It's a think tank for people to sit around the table and deal with the long-term issues."

In the short-term, the Senate and House approved resolutions Wednesday urging the Kansas Corporation Commission to direct money toward assisting middle- and low-income Kansans with natural gas bills.

The votes were 122-0 in the House and 40-0 in the Senate.

The money, up to $45 million, comes from a property tax gas producers passed on to consumers in the 1980s. The resolution targets households of four with yearly incomes between $22,000 and $50,000.

Some Senate Democrats said the resolution doesn't secure money for assistance and they hope more will be done.

"The Utilities Committee takes attempting to find solutions to heart," Chairman Stan Clark, R-Oakley, said. "I pledge this body's ongoing attempt to solve problems."

Wildcats fall to Texas Tech in road game

By PAM EASTON
The Associated Press

LUBBOCK, Texas — Jia Perkins scored 27 points, including six three-pointers, to lead No. 12 Texas Tech to a 72-41 victory over K-State on Wednesday.

Tech's Natalie Ritchie added another 10 points for the Lady Raiders, including two 3-pointers.

The Lady Raiders (16-3, 7-1 Big 12) came out strong during the first half, leading by 28 points at intermission, 49-21.

Perkins hit three of her three-pointers by the 12:15 mark, allowing the Lady Raiders to take a 20-4 lead. They kept the Wildcats (11-8, 1-7) to four points until a technical foul was assessed Texas Tech coach Marsha Sharp for questioning a foul called on Plenette Pierson and then throwing her arms up in disgust at the referee.

K-State's Kristin Rethman hit the two free throws before the Lady Raiders went on a 24-10 run to lead the Wildcats 46-15 with 1:52 left in the half.

Nicole Ohlde scored 15 points to lead K-State, which suffered its fifth straight loss to the Lady Raiders.

The win tied the Lady Raiders for the longest current home-court winning streak in the nation at 40 games. Kent also has 40 consecutive home wins.

It was Sharp's 450th career victory. She is 450-137 in her 19th year at Tech.

AMBIDEXTROUS advantage

K-State forward practices skills with both hands

Lonnie and Pamela Siebrandt must have noticed something different about their son, Matt, when he started playing basketball at the age of nine.

The young Siebrandt, a natural lefty, preferred shooting the ball with his right hand.

And he's done it ever since.

"I don't really know how to explain it," Siebrandt said. "It's something natural — like I play baseball left-handed and golf left-handed, but for some reason, it just feels more comfortable to shoot right-handed."

Whatever the reason, though, it seems to have worked out just fine for the Reno, Nev., native.

The now 6-foot-8 power forward at K-State has started all 18 games for the Wildcats this season, his first year in Manhattan after transferring from Southern Idaho Community College. The sophomore is one of four Cats averaging double figures, posting 10.3 points and 4.2 rebounds per game.

Nevertheless, aside from his performance on the court, Siebrandt said he gets a lot of questions about his hands. After all, he said he's never had it looked at by an expert.

"No one really cared too much about it, so I just keep doing my thing," he said.

Not to say that's a bad thing by any means, though. In fact, Siebrandt said he looks at it as an advantage. Despite shooting jump shots and free throws with his right hand, the forward said he often feels more comfortable making inside moves to the basket with his left.

Sometimes it takes the opposing team a while to catch on, Siebrandt said.

"I think it helps mess up defenders because they don't know what's going on off the block," he said. "I think, eventually, they figure out I'm left handed, but they see me shooting those free throws and probably wonder what's going on."

And if that's not enough to perplex opposing defenses, he uses the huge tattoo on his left arm to psyche them out, Siebrandt said.

The sizable tattoo — a large dragon covering much of his upper arm — is one of several visible on the sophomore's rigid frame. Those tattoos haven't always been a member of Siebrandt's basketball arsenal, though.

Actually, he's only had them for two or three years, as such expressive markings were literally prohibited for the members of the Galena (Nev.) High School basketball program by head coach Tom Maurer.

"I had a real strict coach and we all wanted to get them in high school, but he said he wouldn't play us if we did," Siebrandt said. "So once we got done playing our senior year, me and my teammates went out and got some (tattoos). I've always liked them, and I'm thinking about getting some more."

Although Siebrandt said he doesn't have any particular in mind, he doesn't worry about what anyone else says about them.

"I just like them. Everybody has 'em nowadays, and I don't think it's that big of a deal," he said. "People always ask me, 'When you're 50 years old, are you gonna regret it?' But everybody has them now, so I'm not worried about that."

Fellow sophomore Quentin Buchanan said he agreed.

"Once you play basketball, you've got to have tattoos. It's like a little kid going on right now, but he's got some nice ones," Buchanan said of his teammate.

Nonetheless, behind the tattoo-wearing, hand-switching front Siebrandt might physically present, he is a very dedicated basketball player. Joe Leonard, Siebrandt's roommate, said.

"When we're at home, he's always watching film," Leonard said. "I'm like, 'Man, how do you watch so much film?' But he gets game films and he watches them all night."

"I think that's helped him realize what he can do better and what he can work on."

Leonard said he and Siebrandt have been best friends ever since the forward's recruiting visit to K-State. Now, although his playing career might be over due to a foot injury, he's looking forward to

Former MU back sentenced to 9 years

The Associated Press

LIBERTY, Mo. — John McPherson, once a projected starter in Missouri's defensive backfield, has been sentenced to nine years in prison for felony drug trafficking.

McPherson was sentenced Wednesday in Clay County. As part of his plea agreement entered Dec. 15, McPherson might be released on probation based on his behavior during his first 120 days in prison.

The charge stems from McPherson's arrest July 27 in Lafayette County, about 40 miles east of Kansas City. A Missouri State Highway Patrol trooper pulled McPherson over for driving his vehicle in a careless and imprudent manner on Interstate 70 near Odessa. After receiving permission from McPherson to search the car, the patrolman found 95 pounds of marijuana and $4,031 in cash.

Coach Larry Smith suspended and later dismissed the Missouri cornerback from the team for a violation of team policy and regulations and refused to comment further on the arrest.

Deity makes simple requests to sports world

Dear Kimani Ffriend,
Hi. This is God here. Just wanting to chat a little bit. I know you're probably wondering why I'm writing you write now, or even why I'm using the form of a letter, but I've got something pretty important to tell you. You said something the other night after beating K-State in basketball that kind of ticked me off.

Nebraska had just won its first road game in two years, and you had seven blocked shots, but some of the K-State people thought a couple of those might have been goaltending and were pretty upset. That's not what I'm mad about, though. It's what you told the reporters after the game that kind of teed me off.

To quote, you said, "It's just a great relief, and I have to give God all of the glory tonight," and "There might have been one I think might have been goaltending, but God just gave us a favor this time."

That wasn't me. Sorry.

In fact, I really don't care who wins basketball games or football games or baseball games or any kind of game. Even when Notre Dame is playing, I don't care, except when they're playing Wake Forest or DePaul. I have a hard time cheering for the Demon Deacons or the Blue Demons.

But really, I really don't care who wins. Think about it. If I actively intervened in the sports world, do you think the Super Bowl would have pitted Baltimore against New York? C'mon, that was the most boring game of all time. If anyone had anything to do with that, it would have been Satan.

I also really don't care about some statistic like blocked shots. The only stat to ever intrigue me is saves, but that doesn't have anything to do with baseball. So quit giving me all the credit. Thank your teammates, not me. They're the ones busting their butts trying to get the win. I'm just sitting up here eating manna, listening to harp music and catching the occasional New Orleans Saints and Anaheim Angels games.

Leave me out of your wins, clear?

All right, now, I've also made a list of some other things I don't want to see or hear in sports anymore.

1. Quit calling desperation passes in football Hail Mary's. I don't like religion being associated with something not expected to work.

2. No more players crossing themselves before stepping up to the plate in baseball. It's pretty hypocritical when a player's ritualistic motions include scratching, spitting and crossing. That's not exactly a holy trinity.

3. No more references to the Immaculate Reception. You know, that famous play in a 1972 NFL playoff game in which Pittsburgh quarterback Terry Bradshaw threw a pass to Frenchy Fuqua, but it bounced off Raider linebacker Jack Tatum. Then, running back Franco Harris caught the deflection and ran for the winning touchdown.

Immaculate means flawless, and that play was anything but perfect.

4. No more pointing up to Heaven after scoring a touchdown. I know where I live. You don't need to remind me.

5. Take it easy on players who change their names, like Kareem Abdul-Jabbar (Lew Alcindor). He did that because of me, so leave him alone.

6. Don't take it easy on Mike Tyson, the man who said of Lennox Lewis, "I want your heart. I want to eat your children. Praise Allah." I didn't appreciate that.

That's about it, Kimani. Sorry if you're feeling a little confused right now. I know you meant well, but just leave me out of sports. That is, unless you're up for a game of HORSE. That's a pretty fun game when you're omnipotent.

See you soon, but hopefully not too soon.

Track team to compete in quadrangular this weekend

By ERICA SAUERWEIN
Kansas State Collegian

K-State football isn't the only university sport that has a rivalry with Nebraska.

The track team also has heated matchups with the Cornhuskers. The two teams meet for the second time this season in Nebraska. Colorado and Abilene Christian also are competing this weekend.

"The rivalry has really developed over the last couple years," head coach Cliff Rovelto said. "A long time ago, K-State couldn't even compete with Nebraska. So from their perspective it wasn't. We certainly had a respect for their athletes and their quality program. In recent years, they've had a growing respect for our program."

Rovelto said this quadrangular is not as important as upcoming meets, such as the Iowa State Invitational on Feb. 9 and the Big 12 Championships on Feb. 23-24, but he said the team will fight for the title. Last year Nebraska won the meet.

"Even though the meet is not as crucial in the overall scheme of things, we still want to beat Nebraska," he said.

The Wildcats last faced Nebraska in the Wildcat Invitational on Jan. 12-13. The women won the meet defeating second place Nebraska by 11.5 points. The men finished second to a rallying Nebraska team. The men lost by less than five points.

K-State cannot overlook the other teams in the meet. Abilene Christian is the Division II national champion.

"They have some good athletes and a good program," Rovelto said. "And, by being Division II, they have less illegibility standards for their athletes, so that is a factor."

Colorado has talent as well. Rovelto said Colorado might not have the most complete track team, but that it arguably has the top two or three distance runners in the nation.

"This week will be something of a little down week, but we have had athletes competing in two or three events. So, we will try some new things. We are going to do the best that we can."

expanding to allow for growth.

"There is a very traditional part of campus and an agricultural part of campus to the north," King said. "We want to develop both of those aspects."

Some of the things the focus groups are considering include moving the facilities building, stadium expansions, an addition to Bramlage Coliseum, Chester E.

Peters Recreation Complex expansion, conference center additions to the K-State Student Union and Ahearn Field House, Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art and McCain Auditorium additions, renovations to Ward Hall and Shellenberger Hall and parking structure construction. Carter said all of the ideas are in development stages right now, and the focus groups are encouraging input from students and faculty.

"We are very interested in general of what the students think," Carter said. "The student population thinks of opportunities for change and growth."

Carter said focus groups will continue to meet with HNTB architects to discuss further implementation. He said public forums concerning the development of campus also will be throughout the semester.

"We want to engage people in the process," Carter said.

"We want to make this master plan a living document, so it can continue to be current and relevant to the development of the K-State campus."

barking, and Pule was running away from his hamster. Another person acted like he thought he was a dog.

Pule said 25 computers were connected for the broadcast. He said with multiple viewers at several computers, he thought 60 to 70 people actually watched the show.

He said he knew of one residence hall room where 11 people were watching from one computer.

Pule said the group plans to air "KSU Late Nite" at 10 p.m. every other Tuesday this semester, with hopes of eventually upgrading to weekly production. He said his group is always looking for more students interested in working on production of the show.

"We are currently looking for anyone who thinks they have something to offer to the organization," Pule said, "people who want to work on Web sites, advertising or copy writing for news or other segments. If the show grows enough to air every week, we may also be needing people interested in being on-air personalities."

6 convicts break out of jail

By JAY REEVES
The Associated Press

ST. CLAIR SPRINGS, Ala. — Six convicts, including three murderers, escaped from a maximum-security prison by using a broom handle to slip under a 5,000-volt electric fence.

Officers set up roadblocks and went house to house with tracking dogs Wednesday in a search for the men. Three of them were serving life sentences without parole, and a fourth had broken out of the prison before.

The men escaped from the St. Clair Correctional Facility after dark Tuesday. They got past a series of three fences: A 12-foot interior chain-link fence topped with razor wire, an electrified fence and another razor-topped fence, prison spokesman John Hamm said.

They used a piece of wood — apparently a broom handle — to lift the electric fence so they could slide under it and then slipped under the exterior fence, Prison Commissioner Mike Haley said. He said it was not clear how they got past the first fence.

An alarm that is supposed to go off automatically if anyone tampers with the electric fence did not sound, Haley said. Corrections officials have described the prison as severely understaffed. The electric fence was installed about five years ago as a backup.

Haley said two of the inmates had been in a residence hall with 250 prisoners and only two guards.

The men also got past a guard driving around the outside of the fence. Haley said it takes that guard several minutes to circle the prison, time enough for someone to flee after watching him pass.

The men were discovered missing during an 8 p.m. head count but could have escaped as early as 5:30 p.m., giving them a head start on searchers, Haley said. Authorities were unsure whether the fugitives were armed. No prison weapons were missing.

Sophomore Josh Hagg spends 2-3 hours every day playing online games. Hagg got started gaming when he lived in the residence halls last year, and instead of watching television, he plays games such as Ultima Online.

Online interaction

He goes online and can play games with 2,000 people

By JJ DUNCAN
Kansas State Collegian

Laughing and joking with friends he met in a video game, Josh Hagg discusses the group's latest conquests within Ultima Online, a game they all play over the Internet.

Before meeting Eugene Gephart, a soldier based at Fort Riley, in real life, Hagg met him within the confines of Ultima Online, Hagg, sophomore in business, said. Ultima Online is a fantasy role-playing game that players access over the Internet and play along with many other players.

The world of online gaming has exploded over the past couple of years, and Hagg said it might be because of the interaction with other players the games offer.

Instead of one to four players being able to play a game at once, players are able to play with anywhere from two to 2,000 other players without ever seeing them face-to-face. The result is that the games can offer a social life in addition to their real one, Hagg said.

"I wouldn't say the game is my social life," he said. "I have plenty of friends outside of it, but I've met several friends through the game, and I would say it is a branch of my social life."

The human interaction in games that are limited only by the will of the players creates worlds that can be as immersing as the real one. One of the attractions of online games is there is no end to them. Players can keep playing for as long as they maintain appeal, continuously honing their skills, Hagg said.

In games such as Ultima Online and EverQuest, players start with weak characters and are enticed to continue playing because they can increase skills, levels and quality of equipment.

Within the genre of strategy shooter games such as Half-Life and Unreal Tournament, players can kill each others' characters by fighting alone or on teams. Since players are fighting each other in these games, there is no end to the possibilities of fighting in new environments or attempting new strategies.

Garrett Pennington, freshman in computer science, said his favorite online games are Unreal Tournament and an expansion of Half-Life called Counter-Strike. In Counter-Strike, players fight in teams, one of them fighting as terrorists and the other team fighting as counter-terrorists.

"When you play against other people, it's different from playing against a computer program that does the same thing every time," Pennington said. "Since you are playing against people, the game keeps changing because they try new strategies and keep getting better."

While gaming systems come and go (Sega just announced they will stop production on the Dreamcast system that was so popular just last year), online games keep growing. The gaming experience never becomes stagnant because the games themselves continuously are updated through expansions and patches.

Be it good or bad, one word is used most often by online gamers to describe their favorite games — addictive.

"Online gaming is addictive. Oh God, it's addictive," Pennington said. "Playing online creates a whole new aspect of the game that keeps you playing."

While this means the games are well-made with excellent replay value, it also means players end up spending many hours playing. Pennington said on average he plays two to three hours a day, occasionally playing for up to nine hours at a time.

Gephart said he spends many hours playing each day.

"I get up at 5:25 a.m. each day and play for about 10 or 15 minutes before going outside for drills," he said. "After about an hour, I come back in and play for another hour. Then I work until my lunch break, when I play for my whole hour and a half lunch break."

"I get off work at 4:30 p.m. and play until I go to sleep at one or two, sometimes three in the morning."

Gephart said he started his latest character just after Thanksgiving and, using a feature on the game, he has tracked his total playtime for the character is more than 45,000 minutes. That translates into 31 days, six hours of time played.

Hagg said the fact that characters can become so personalized keeps people playing to create a character representative of their personalities.

"My character on Ultima Online is a reflection of what I've done in the game," he said. "Anything that character accomplishes is something I put effort into."

Many of these gamers seem aware of the consequences the massive playtime can have on school work. Pennington, who lives in the residence halls, said he has seen firsthand how the games can affect a student.

"I don't have a roommate right now because we couldn't pry him off the computer," he said. "It got habitual for him."

"When he had an option of studying or playing, he would always get online. He would stay up late and eventually realize it was 5 a.m. and he had class in two hours, so he just wouldn't go."

Hagg said with as many people as he knew who played in the residence halls, he would estimate there are at least five online gamers per male floor, since gamers are most often male. Hagg no longer lives in the residence halls, but he said one gamer he knew on his floor became so immersed in the digital worlds that he disregarded real concerns.

"I didn't see a problem with online games until one day I looked at him," Hagg said. "I realized he didn't go to class anymore, and his girlfriend broke up with him because he didn't spend any time with her. He got put on academic probation and left K-State."

The dangers of online gaming haven't affected Pennington, he said, because he knows when to turn the game off. Some people don't have the will power to stop playing, so it easily can become a vice, he said.

People are always looking for entertaining distractions, and Pennington said if they weren't playing online games, then they probably would devote too much time to something else.

Online gaming seems to be the trend for anyone who plays, and the future of them looks strong, Hagg said. The entertainment value is high because the games keep evolving, he said.

"People used to think that watching television was addictive because people would spend so much time watching," he said. "Video games, and especially online games, are the next level of entertainment past television."

watching his roommate come into his own in the Big 12.

"He's going to be great because he's the kind of player that fits this conference — real physical and strong," Leonard said. "This year he's done a good job, and I just think if he keeps progressing he can be a great player in this conference, and hopefully one day be all-league."

However, for Siebrandt, the transition to the size and strength at the Division 1A level has been all but an easy task so far — but he's not going to let it get him down.

"I've had a few good games, and I've had a few tough ones," Siebrandt said. "I expected this whole year to be up and down since I was getting used to this level of competition and trying to turn the program around, so I'm just trying to stay positive and come in every game and give a good effort."

Bush, Black Caucus discuss problems

By SONYA ROSS
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Black lawmakers aired a list of grievances to President Bush on Wednesday, reiterating their deep opposition to the confirmation of John Ashcroft as attorney general and reminding Bush of the wounds inflicted by the Florida election deadlock.

Thirty-one members of the Congressional Black Caucus discussed more than 20 issues with the Republican president.

including racial profiling, election reform, AIDS, Africa, education and civil rights. The meeting, which Bush spokesman Ari Fleischer described as cordial, lasted 90 minutes — twice as long as scheduled.

Bush pledged a high level of sensitivity on civil rights, and promised to make Africa a high priority, Fleischer and participants said.

Bush opened the meeting by telling his visitors, "I will remind you all that I understand the difference between the executive branch and the legislative branch. I only get to suggest, and you all pass the laws."

"That's right," Rep. Carrie Meek, D-Fla., responded.

"I understand that well," Bush replied with a smile.

The Republican president told the caucus that he saw the gathering as the beginning of hopefully a lot of meetings.

No single issue dominated the meeting, said Fleischer, who attended. But Rep. Elijah Cummings, D-Md., said the Ashcroft nomination took up quite a bit of time.

Recreational Services' Office Located in Peters Recreation Complex

Indoor Tracks and Circuit Workout

The weather is always just right for working out at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex. Two of the most popular areas are the indoor tracks and the circuit machines. "The indoor tracks offer patrons a comfortable and unique setting for walking and jogging," said Amanda Forsyth, Graduate Student in Kinesiology. "The tracks are designed so that people of all ages and all different levels of fitness can use them and enjoy their workout." Each track is elevated. The track above the small gym measures 14 laps to the mile and accommodates both walkers and runners. The mall track has 4 lanes and is 1/8 of a mile around. Two inside lanes are designated for walking and two outside lanes are for running. The mall track is made of poured-in-place polyurethane, over a 14mm cushion pad. This provides a resilient/shock absorbing surface. It is the same surface found in the multipurpose/aerobics area. "This basically makes it more comfortable to run on," said Raydon Robel, director of Recreational Services. "So far, people have been very happy with it." The larger track was added in 1995 as part of the new addition to the Rec.

In order for an area to be named a "circuit" it needs to have ten or more stations. The circuit area in the Rec offers 17 stations to use. These stations are designed to work all major muscle groups by exercising the lower body and then alternate muscles of the upper body. This type of workout minimizes stress on the muscle groups, thus reducing muscle fatigue. "Circuit training is a great workout for your entire body," said Forsyth. "All of our machines are easy to use and display which muscle group will be worked." Circuit training is an excellent way to improve cardiovascular efficiency, muscular strength and endurance. Three workouts have been preplanned for beginners, intermediate, and advanced users and are color-coded for easier use. Circuit workout brochures are available at the Rec for those interested in beginning a regular workout.

In the Spot Light

Lafayette Health Center has a new Head of Sports Medicine. Dr. David M. Smith is returning to K-State after having received his B.S. degree here in 1980. He then attended medical school at KU Med where he received his degree in 1985, completed a family practice residency at Michigan State in 1988, and a sports medicine fellowship at Cleveland Clinic in 1989. For the past ten years, Dr. Smith has practiced sports medicine at KU Med in Kansas City and served as Co-Director of SportsCare at Shawnee Mission Medical Center, also in Kansas City. "I have wanted to work for a major university since I got out of school," said Smith. "This position is perfect because it allows me to work with students and use my background in sports medicine and family practice. The Sports Medicine Department hasn't been too active for the past year or two, so hopefully I can turn some things around," said Smith. Smith is also excited about his new job because it gives him the opportunity to work with some of his fellow athletes. "I actually practice what I preach," said Smith. "I compete in triathlons, so I have a reputation for treating runners and cyclists. However, my main goal is to keep people active without being slowed down by their injuries." The Sports Medicine Department provides trainers for the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex each year. Dr. Smith will have a part in training them so they can provide the best treatment to students and staff using their services.

Words of Wellness

Become the most positive and enthusiastic person you know!

My Favorite Workout

There is a secret Adam Hobson has discovered this school year about coming to the Rec on a regular basis. "Come with a friend, it helps to motivate each other," said Hobson. Hobson should know. This is the first time he has kept up a steady routine of coming to the Rec since he got here three years ago. A junior in Industrial Engineering, Hobson enjoys coming to the Rec to play basketball and lift weights three times a week - always with a friend. "The Rec is a great place to come to," said Hobson. "There are so many options to choose from for your workout. There are also a lot of different types of weights, so that is good too." He also has a suggestion for both rec-goers and non-rec-goers. "Get a routine going and stick to it. It is way too easy to get out of shape."

Footwear

All Recreation Complex participants are reminded to wear athletic, nonmarking footwear in the facility. Black soled running shoes are allowed only in the weight/fitness area and on the running tracks. Court areas require a court shoe. For better traction, we recommend that users carry in their workout shoes. Open toed shoes or sandals are not permitted in the weight/fitness area.

Working It Out

A great way to take away the Valentine's Day blues or to improve that body for your special sweetheart is to start working out at the Rec and change those frowns into smiles after attending a challenging and fun-filled aerobics session. There are some great new additions to some of the sessions for this spring, such as using punching bags in Cardio Kick and more intense and "powerful" moves in Power Step.

Exercise Leader Training Program

A training program for anyone interested in learning to become an exercise leader will be held February 18-April 11 at the Recreation Complex. This 6-week class will be held on Sundays from 7-9 PM and Wednesdays from 8:15-9:15 PM. No prior experience is required! Register by February 15 in the Administrative Office at the Rec Complex. Payment of $30 registration fee is required. For more information, contact Amanda at 532-6980.

Nutrition Notes

Celebrate Valentine's Day with Chocolate

Valentine's Day (Feb 14) is a day for hearts, love and chocolate. With a little planning, healthy can enter the mix. Chocolate has been a popular candy since the mid 1800's and most Americans still enjoy its taste. The key to enjoying it this Valentine's Day, or any day, is how you work it into your eating plan. Chocolate and most other sweets, contain fat and sugar and should be used in smaller amounts after you have chosen foods from the other food groups in the pyramid. In addition, limiting other high fat foods can help you keep your fat intake down. So for Valentine's Day, enjoy a piece or two of candy, but cut back somewhere else. Learning to include all your favorite foods in moderate portions can help make healthful eating fun, satisfying and lifelong.

Megan Brzon, senior in nutrition & exercise science and dietetics is one of the Rec's newest employees. She has been a fitness consultant in the Wellness Resource Center for one month. However, she knew she wanted to work at the Rec even before she started her new job. "I enjoy working out at the Rec and felt that it would be a fun place to work," said Brzon. Although she has been here just a short time, she already enjoys her job. "I enjoy the fun and laid back atmosphere here at the Rec," said Brzon. "I also like the fact that I get to meet so many new people." Brzon will graduate in May 2001 and hopes to work as a dietitian in a health and wellness center. Megan is from Courtland, Kansas.

Gaining experience in a fitness facility is what prompted Eric Underwood, senior in Kinesiology, to apply at the Rec. "I plan to become a personal trainer after I graduate, so working here as a fitness consultant will help to prepare me for a career," said Underwood. Underwood is one of four new fitness consultants to be found in the Wellness Resource Center this semester. Underwood looks forward to his job and some of the challenges it may bring with it throughout the semester. "I really enjoy helping students get started on a fitness program," said Underwood. "I know how difficult it can be. Some people just need that extra boost." After a May 2001 graduation, Underwood hopes to be employed as a personal trainer or a strength and conditioning coach. Underwood is from Winchester, Kansas.

Friends remember accident victim

By AMY MORGAN
Kansas State Collegian

The life and memory of Adrian John Polansky II, junior in agricultural economics and known to most as A.J., was celebrated Thursday night by family, friends and students who remembered his smile, laughter and humble personality.

Damon Parker, sophomore in secondary education and Polansky's best friend and roommate, spoke of his memories of his friend.

"He was always so happy — even if something bad happened, he would just shake it off," Parker said. "He was the funniest and always was smiling."

Parker was Polansky's high school athletic teammate in football, wrestling and tennis, and shared personal stories that brought smiles to the audience, including a continual eating contest that started in the eighth grade. Polansky was a 1998 graduate of Manhattan High School.

Polansky died Tuesday morning in a two-vehicle accident near Washington, Kan., on U.S. Highway 36 when his car hit a westbound traveling vehicle.

The First Presbyterian Church, 801 Leavenworth St., was the location of the memorial, where expressions of love and support were apparent by friends, family and students in attendance. A portrait of Polansky was placed at the front of the church as well as a coat rack that held his coat and hat in remembrance.

A display was set up in the back of the sanctuary with different personal items that gave those in attendance an idea of his successful endeavors in high school football, wrestling, tennis and his experiences with friends and family.

Lee Woodford, Polansky's high school wrestling coach, former teacher and friend spoke at the service.

"I emphasize that he was a champion in every aspect and are honoring the memory of a young man whose life ended in tragedy," Woodford said. "I learned to know and love A.J., and he was loving, caring, sensitive and willing to give more than he expected in return."

Polansky's great-uncle, Henry Strnad, read a poem written by Polansky's cousin and biblical passages that exemplified his life.

"We celebrate the life and love A.J. shared with us all," the Rev. R.C. McConnell said.

McConnell described many of Polansky's traits.

"He was a hard-worker, always happy, loyal in friendships, a fine student and a person who had a heart as big as he was, who loved his family," McConnell said.

McConnell also spoke of Polansky's love of his family farm and strong work ethic he demonstrated. Polansky was a driving force in the family farm and recently had purchased land himself, McConnell said.

Senate confirms Ashcroft

By LIBBY QUAID
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A Senate majority voted Thursday to confirm John Ashcroft to be attorney general, giving President Bush a victory in his first battle with congressional Democrats, who served notice they will try to defeat conservative nominees in the future.

The vote stood at 58-41 Thursday afternoon but the roll call was being kept open to accommodate Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., who was returning to the Capitol from a family funeral. Biden voted against Ashcroft earlier this week when the Senate Judiciary Committee approved the nomination.

Ashcroft had the support of all 50 Senate Republicans. But Democrats mustered enough votes to show Bush they have the ability to defeat conservative nominees in the future, particularly candidates for any Supreme Court vacancy.

"His nominees for the Supreme Court would better serve the nation if they came from the middle," Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said.

The chamber's top Democrat, Minority Leader Tom Daschle of Destiny's Child concert tickets on sale Saturday

By CORBIN H. CRABLE

Billboard's Artist of the Year will rock Bramlage Coliseum next month.

R&B group Destiny's Child will be in concert at 7:30 p.m. March 31 at Bramlage, and tickets for the concert go on sale at 10 a.m. tomorrow. Ticket prices are $27.50 and $34.50 and can be purchased at the Bramlage ticket office, the K-State Union Bookstore and Streetside Records in Aggieville.

Amy O'Brien, student coordinator for the Union Bookstore, said they are expecting the tickets to sell out quickly.

"We've already had lots of calls about it," she said. "We're trying to prepare for the rush."

Seth Lamborn, assistant manager of Streetside, said he thinks the Destiny's Child concert will prove to be just as huge as last fall's Dixie Chicks concert.

"The Dixie Chicks was a great show, but I'll bet we'll sell more for this one," he said.

Teamwork a challenge

Working together focus of meeting

By NICK BRATKOVIC
Kansas State Collegian

Working with a purple sheet and nine pairs of feet, members of the Institute for Industrial Engineers Club came together Thursday night with the purpose of problem solving.

"Good job. You are a natural leader," Lyoid Fussell, senior in industrial engineering, said to his team from the sideline.

Fussell was left out of the group as the challenge called for nine people on the sheet — he was number 10. Together, the group worked in a disorganized manner to turn the sheet over while standing on it. In the activity, the other side of the sheet was an advancement to the other side of the island in a challenge known as shipwreck.

A second or two later the group took a step back and returned in the shape of an "L," which proved to be a winning combination. The process was accompanied by laughter as, inch-by-inch, the task was completed.

"It was challenging as we had to lean one way and then another," Wesley Smith, senior in industrial engineering, said. "It was nice because people don't always work as a team, but we didn't let difference get in the way."

For Marcy Atkinson, vice president of the club which meets frequently to discuss a variety of issues relating to the department, the idea for the night stemmed from her summer internship.

Telefund kicks off 22nd year of fund raising Sunday night

By SHANNON MARSHALL
Kansas State Collegian

Each of K-State's nine colleges are gearing up for the 22nd-annual KSU Foundation's Telefund, which is scheduled to begin at 6 p.m. Sunday.

Telefund is the world's largest volunteer telephone campaign for higher education and has raised $12.9 million in its 21 years of existence. It is designed so each college at K-State has its own separate Telefund campaign to raise money for individual college improvements and scholarships.

The College of Engineering and the College of Veterinary Medicine will begin their campaigns Sunday. The College of Veterinary Medicine's campaign will last through Monday, and the campaign for the College of Engineering will last through Thursday. Telefund at K-State-Salina College of Technology and Aviation started Sunday, Jan. 21 and concluded this week.

The pledge total from 2000 was $1,235,174. This year's pledge goal has been set at $1,234,567+. The "plus" stands for the pledge totals from K-State's Salina campus.

Gordon Dowell, director of annual giving, explained why Telefund is different from other universities' telephone campaigns.

"The significance of Telefund is that it's an all-volunteer job," he said. "At other universities, you've got students who do this for a job, but they have to meet quotas and other requirements. Our participants are all volunteers from K-State."

A number of prizes will be awarded to Telefund participants. In addition to restaurant gift certificates, Manhattan Town Center gift certificates and other awards from area businesses, four grand prizes will be awarded. First prize is a 2000 Dodge Neon, second prize is a $1,000 scholarship, third prize is a $500 scholarship and fourth prize is a $250 catered picnic.

Emily Sagen, sophomore in elementary education, participated in Telefund last year and said she enjoyed the experience.

"It was fun because there were lots of prizes and snacks you could win," she said. "I won some fast food certificates and gasoline certificates. Telefund allows you to have a part in bringing in money and scholarships specifically for your department or college."

Dowell said he encourages all K-State students to participate.

"You can't fully understand the impact of Telefund until you actually work for a night and see the energy and excitement of all the volunteers," he said. "It's just an amazing experience."

Question of the week

Q: I am tired of eating at the K-State Student Union all the time while I am on campus over the lunch hour. Is there anywhere else on campus I could go to and get some reasonably priced food?

A: Although still in the Union, the Bluemont Buffet has a daily buffet-style salad bar, entree, vegetables, hot rolls, desserts and beverages. It is open Monday through Friday from 11 a.m. to 1:30 p.m. on the second floor of the Union. The Arch Cafe is open Tuesday through Friday from 11 a.m. to 1:30 p.m. at the Mariana Kistler Beach Museum of Art. The Bookplate Cafe serves sandwiches and other items in the 24-hour study room of Hale Library over the noon hour and Subway and Campbell's are other Union favorites.

Airline merger debated by Commerce Committee

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Missouri lawmakers said Thursday that American Airlines' proposed acquisition of TWA could save thousands of jobs in their state, but others cautioned that consumers could be the losers from reduced competition. Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee, said the deal would accelerate movement toward control of the aviation industry by three giants — United, American and Delta. "I don't know of anyone, other than the airlines, who think that a 'big 3' industry is good for the consumer," he said at a hearing on the proposed American-TWA merger.

The deal is "fundamentally different" from other airline consolidations that have recently changed the makeup of the aviation industry, Missouri Gov. Bob Holden told the committee. He said that without the deal, Missouri would lose nearly 33,000 jobs and $876 million in annual wages.

General-fund revenue less than anticipated

TOPEKA — The latest news about the state budget isn't good for legislators.

State Budget Director Duane Goossen confirmed Thursday the state didn't collect as much in revenue in its general fund as expected in January. It was the second consecutive month that collections have fallen short of expectations.

The $4.6 billion general fund is the largest source of money for general government programs and is where the state deposits most of its tax revenues. Gov. Bill Graves based his budget proposals on predictions made in November for revenue collections.

Goossen said revenue collections for the general fund were about $15 million short of estimates in January.

That's on top of the nearly $33 million by which revenue collections for December fell short of the estimates.

Goossen said he expects the total gap between the estimates and actual collections to be about $50 million. The Legislative Research Department isn't expected to release final numbers until next week.

The state still expects to collect more general fund revenues in its 2001 fiscal year, which began July 1, than it did in fiscal 2000.

Bush touts state aid to faith-based charities

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Bush told lawmakers, foreign heads of state and spiritual leaders at a prayer session Thursday that government should not be a barrier to religious groups helping the needy.

"Faith crosses every border and touches every heart in every nation," he said.

Addressing the National Prayer Breakfast, an annual gathering traditionally attended by presidents, Bush promoted a series of initiatives allowing religious institutions to compete for a share of social-services money that the government distributes.

Bush also has proposed tax breaks to encourage charitable giving.

"Government cannot be replaced by charity, but it can welcome them as partners instead of resenting them as rivals," he said.

The Republican president said religious faith is deeply ingrained in America. "Our country has recognized the contribution of faith. We do not impose any religion."

"We welcome all religions. We do not prescribe prayer. We welcome all prayer. This has been the tradition of our nation and it will be the standard of my administration."

Critics have suggested that his religion-based initiatives could blur the lines separating church and state, a point denied by Bush.

"An American president serves people of every faith and serves some with no faith at all. Yet I have found that my faith helps me in the service of people," said Bush, a Methodist and regular churchgoer.

Student spends time as Girl Scout troop assistant

By JENNIFER O'NEILL
Kansas State Collegian

The kindergarten room at Marlatt Elementary School was turned upside down Thursday night, but not by its usual occupants.

Instead, the young women of Girl Scout Troop 222 gathered for their biweekly meeting.

Troop 222 is a group full of ambitious seventh graders with one special fact — one of their helpers is a K-State student.

Chloe Steinshouer, senior in nutritional science, is a former scout who enjoys helping out troops.

In her hometown of Wichita, she went through the necessary training to be a leader and has been helping since her freshman year in high school.

Six months ago, Steinshouer found Troop 222.

"I'd actually been looking for a troop, and some people I knew put me in contact with Ruth Welti," she said.

Welti, professor of biology at K-State, is the actual troop leader, and Steinshouer is her assistant.

"I'm not an official leader because I didn't go through the training necessary for the Kaw Valley Council," she said.

Steinshouer said each different council in Kansas requires its own training to become a leader.

"They're just so much fun," she said. "The other night they had a little campout, and we just laughed the whole time."

Welti said Steinshouer is good at providing the girls with practical experience.

"She adds consistency to the troop with all of the different parents coming in and out, and she is really dedicated," she said.

Allison Row, a senior at Manhattan High School and a leader in training, said Steinshouer has brought a lot to the troop in the short time she's been there.

"She brings new songs and knowledge about knots and other camping lessons, and she just really works well with these girls," she said.

One of the troop's favorite activities is sing songs. Steinshouer, being a scout for 12 years, has compiled a book full of songs they've taught one another.

"There are even songs in here that my mother taught me. Those are 40 years old," she said.

Row said she has learned a lot about working with the girls from watching Steinshouer.

At the meeting, Steinshouer prepared the troop for campouts by demonstrating how to tie a variety of knots using licorice.

"She's really nice and fun to work with," said Chelsea Parker, a seventh grader at Susan B. Anthony Middle School. "She has lots of ideas for camping and good activities to do for meetings."

Heather Allen, a seventh grader at Susan B. Anthony, said she wants to be a scout leader just like Steinshouer someday.

"She's experienced as a Girl Scout, and she knows how to do things we've never tried before," she said. "We can learn a lot from her."

Steinshouer took the time to answer every girl who asked, "Like that?" as they held up their knots for her approval.

"She's very patient," said Aneisha Brewer, a seventh grader at Susan B. Anthony. "When she first got here, we weren't getting along with the girls from Eisenhower, and she made us come together."

Steinshouer said her years in Girl Scouts have taught her that no matter how much you think you know, you never stop learning.

"Without a whole lot of effort," she said, "you can make a big difference."

Senate introduces resolution for uniform handling of wait lists

By JESSICA PITTS
Kansas State Collegian

Student Senate introduced a resolution recommending K-State administration implement a uniform wait-list handling system for all colleges and departments Thursday.

"Wait-lists are common at K-State, and all colleges and departments have different procedures," said Kyle Brownback, academic affairs and university relations chair. "This process is confusing for a lot of students, and we just want to try and find a system that would be useful and beneficial to students and faculty."

Arts and Sciences Sen. Sarah Nixon said she is glad to see the resolution moving through Senate.

"I have actually had a personal experience with waiting lists that turned bad," Nixon said. "We have heard a lot of complaints, and we just think a more uniform system would be more appropriate."

Now, the university uses a waiting list that is activated through KATS; however, Brownback said this system is not always used.

"A lot of the colleges have their own waiting lists and completely bypass the KATS way," he said. "There is no way for students to know which way to go."

In other action, Senate sent the Advising Bill of Rights resolution back to committee for further review.

"After talking to the Faculty Senate executive committee, there are some things we want to add and some other things we want to look at," Jake Worcester, student body president, said. "They made some good recommendations, and we don't want to rush this thing through."

Last week, Senate introduced the bill urging Faculty Senate to adopt the Advising Bill of Rights as minimum standards for advising performance. The bill followed the adoption of the resolution to recommend support for advising accountability.

"So far, the administration has been working with us with the first recommendation, so we want to listen to their suggestions for the Bill of Rights," Worcester said. "We want it to benefit students in the end, so we want to take the time to make it right."

6 Alabama convict escapees recaptured in Tennessee after stopping to rest

By TOM SHARP
The Associated Press

DICKSON, Tenn. — Six escaped convicts from an Alabama prison were arrested Thursday in Tennessee where they stopped for a rest after stocking up on shampoo and bologna sandwiches.

The inmates were caught near an Interstate 40 exit about 50 miles west of Nashville and about 165 miles from the prison.

Captured were Billy Gamble, 24; Steve Murphy, 45; O.C. Borden, 33; Jack Allred, 43; James McClain, 35; and Gary Scott, 31, said Dana Keeton, a spokeswoman for the Department of Safety.

Scott, Murphy and Borden were serving life sentences for murder.

In a brief television interview moments after his arrest, McClain said the escaped convicts spent their time out of prison having fun.

"We just partied, drank and got high — just had a good time," said McClain, who was serving a 20-year sentence for burglary.

The inmates escaped Tuesday by slipping beneath an electric fence and two razor wire fences at Alabama's St. Clair Correctional Facility before guards noticed they were gone.

Authorities said they were found as a result of a stroke of luck.

Just after midnight, two sheriff's deputies, looking for someone who had stolen a street sign, came upon a car parked off a country road near a creek the convicts apparently were using to wash up.

The inmates "scattered like a bunch of deer" into the woods, said Darrell Groves, one of the deputies.

The deputies learned the car had been stolen from Alabama and was possibly being used by the fugitives. Inside, authorities found shotguns, an empty pistol holder and several makeshift knives.

The deputies called for additional help and caught the first three inmates around 6 a.m. with the help of a tracking dog.

"We ordered them to give up and they came out unarmed," police officer Bryan Johnson said. "We said, 'Who are you?' And, they said, 'You know who we are.'"

Allred and McClain were found within another hour. Scott eluded authorities for another five hours before two residents spotted him crouched under a bridge.

"We told an FBI agent, went down the road a little piece and turned around, and by the time we got there, there were three state highway patrol cars there," said Benny Ramsey, one of the residents.

Extradition hearings for the inmates were pending.

Alabama prison commissioner Mike Haley has blamed the escape on a manpower shortage and faulty security, including an electric fence that was breached using a broom handle and an alarm system that didn't go off.

The 1,300-man prison has 188 guards, about 65 fewer than are needed, so officials rely on technology for security. "Our technology failed," Haley said.

Officials realized the men were missing during an 8 p.m. head count, the commissioner said.

"They spend all this money and can send a man to the moon but they can't build a fence to keep these guys in prison?" asked Dick Haverland, who lives in nearby Springville, about 20 miles northeast of Birmingham.

Campaign good cause; student helpers needed

The 22nd annual KSU Foundation Telefund kicks off this Sunday. According to the Web site www.found.ksu.edu/telefund/ the Telefund is a monthlong, student-driven, alumni-supported telephone campaign. The Telefund is coordinated by the KSU Foundation and is held in the Hollis Telefund Center at the KSU Foundation center.

This year, Telefund has a goal of $1,234,567 in pledges, 23,000 donors and 1,500 student volunteers.

That is a record that only can be broken by student participation and alumni support.

Telefund benefits all nine academic colleges, usually in terms of student scholarships. Those who participate in the event benefit as well. More than $60,000 in prizes, which include a 2000 Dodge Neon, will be given away.

For more information, contact an adviser, the head of your college or call the KSU Foundation at 532-6266.

It is of extreme importance that students take this annual event as an opportunity that will not only benefit them, but also their college.

More than meets the eye

People should suspend prejudging those with disabilities

Little League, summer break and tether ball at recess are just a few of the things that made being a kid so much fun. Like playing catch with dad and watching movies with mom, these are childhood memories many people carry with them their entire lives.

Although these are the things that every so-called "normal" childhood is supposed to consist of, my childhood — like many others — was far from being "normal." I was never given the opportunity to play catch with my dad. And he never taught me how to ride a bike or how to drive a car — that all was left to my mom.

Despite what many of you might be thinking, my dad isn't a busy workaholic, he is still living and my parents are not divorced or separated. My dad has muscular dystrophy — the same thing Jerry Lewis tries to raise money for every year — and has been confined to a wheelchair almost all of his life.

What I remember most about growing up — aside from playing little league baseball, summer break and afternoon recess — are all of the stupid questions that people would ask me and my brother about our dad. "What's wrong with your dad? Is he OK? Can he talk? Isn't that contagious? When you grow up, won't your kids be like your dad? How come you're not like your dad?" But my favorite question of all time has to be "Is he really your dad?" To which my brother and I tried to respond politely while fighting back the urge to say, "Of course he's really my dad! It's not like you can just go out and rent a dad like you would a car or a cop. Idiot!"

As I got older these moronic questions were replaced with stares of disbelief, shameless gawking and those who'd rather turn a cold shoulder than be impolite and stare. I also began to realize there is as much discrimination toward those with disabilities as any other minority, which becomes increasingly apparent every time someone asks my mom, brother or me "And what would he like?"

Sadly, these experiences are not limited to my family or myself and are experienced by everyone who has or knows someone with a disability.

TRAVIS WEIGEL

The biggest problem facing those with disabilities is the fact that society sees them as just that: people who are disabled and handicapped. As a result, they often are viewed as a useless part of society, with no tangible value and merely are a burden upon the rest of society. This has made them into the lepers of the 21st century who are avoided like the plague and ignored like truth — in the hopes they will just go away. Unfortunately, this has caused perfectly intelligent and capable people to live in the discarded scraps of a great society, with some forced to live in homes that are kept isolated from the rest of the world — admittedly, this is better than the insane asylums they were sent to years ago.

People are people. They come in all different shapes, sizes, sexes, colors and forms with none of them being any better or worse than any of the rest. And despite popular opinion and all of the common misperceptions, those with disabilities are just like everyone else — they are not perfect and they do have something to contribute to the rest of society.

Everyone has their own limitations. It just so happens that a person with some kind of physical disability cannot hide their obvious limitations and is forced to live with it publicly. And to assume that a disability would somehow prevent anyone from having any kind of ability is simply ridiculous — Franklin Delano Roosevelt is a perfect example of that.

So, the next time you have the opportunity to interact with someone who happens to have a disability, remember, it's not their disability that makes them special — like everyone else — it's their ability.

Only at K-State is it possible to have an interpersonal communications teacher that really doesn't speak English. Thanks, K-State. I'm paying for a great education.

Hey, Doyle, thanks for the Judiciary Committee Chairman phone number. I just got through voicing my total approval of John Ashcroft.

Who cares how many people were at the party when the floor caved in? How many kegs did they have?

I remember when I had a sign on my dorm room that said "Free Pelvic Exams." Good times. Good times.

I just found out the hard way that, as a tenant, I have no rights at all. Especially in big apartment complexes.

God bless "Temptation Island."

So, Sprint, not enough complaints about service? Well, I tried to call the fourum for 10 minutes using your cell phone, but couldn't get through. I am glad I still have my home phone.

SGA meets promises made to students, fulfills platform goals

I have always had respect for people involved with the Student Governing Association.

As a freshman and sophomore, it was more of a distant respect. I admired the time and energy they put in, but could not tell you exactly what had been done during their terms.

As a junior, my focus began to change and my gaze became deeper. I became more focused on exactly what SGA was doing because I realized their decisions effected me.

Every spring, we as students get to choose those whom we deem most worthy to represent us. Their representation extends not only over this campus, but on the city and state level as well. Last spring there were about eight pairs of candidates we could choose from.

Last spring I cared. I scrutinized over who I wanted to vote for like it was some sort of national election, taking the time and effort to figure out who would be the best.

I came to realize how essential accountability is. I wanted to elect those who would hold themselves accountable for the promises they made in their platforms to students.

I did not vote for Jake Worcester and Dana Pracht.

Looking back on it, I wish I would have.

A week into this semester, I called Worcester. I wanted to take a look at what exactly the SGA had accomplished over the last semester. I wanted to keep them accountable for the promises they had made to students last spring in their platform. I wanted proof they had done something worthwhile, something other than campaigning like mad for the failed student activities center.

It was not very fair of me, but I asked him for an interview. I wanted to hear how things have unraveled from his point of view. A few days later I found myself sitting in his office, asking him to justify what Student Senate has done over the last semester. I wanted some answers.

After talking with him and Pracht for an hour, I was pleasantly surprised to find out all the progress they had made toward fulfilling their campaigning goals and all the other little things they had done along the way that Worcester classified as items that "don't get press."

There were three main areas on their platform last spring. One was to improve student life. (OK, when I read this a few weeks ago, the cynic inside me said, "Gee, that is a nice, very broad platform goal that almost anyone can throw a variety of things to fill in and feel satisfied about.") As we sat discussing how they felt they had worked toward this goal, I was impressed with their level of dedication to fulfilling their promises.

They said they felt they had improved student life by working on the implementation of mandatory rental inspections on the city level, furthering the plans for the citywide transportation system and by putting together a city guide of available housing for students. I would say this is a valid effort to improve all of our lives.

Their second platform goal was to improve technology on campus. Some of the things they originally had proposed were to make transcripts available online and get laser printers in the computing labs on campus.

Worcester said although they have not gotten the whole transcript thing worked out, they have made a valid effort to get the laser printers on campus. Worcester said about half of the computer labs on campus have laser printers and by the end of the year, all will. Not too shabby.

Worcester also said they helped to implement the new InfoCommons in the library. If you have not checked this out yet, get over your fear and get in the library. According to Worcester, they have about 100 new computers that not only have the Internet, but Microsoft word, Excel and other programs.

Lastly, he said they have worked to improve academic quality. OK,

if you have not fallen asleep by now, just stick with me, I am getting to the point. He said they have tried making advisers more accountable. This resolution was passed in Student Senate last week and will be moving forward through the different administrative levels this spring. Ah, thank God. It is about time we started making advisers more accountable.

So why have I gone on for the last ever so many inches about SGA? Who cares if they have fulfilled their platform goals? I do.

With student elections coming up just around the corner, it is vital to take a look at what has been done and what is being proposed. Take a vested interest in SGA; these students have the power to affect our pay checks, lives and sanity. Take the time. Do your research and either elect or inspire those to run who will make a difference and fulfill their promises.

Union Subway contract to expire this summer

By RACHEL POWERS
Kansas State Collegian

Subway soon might be out of business at the K-State Student Union.

"Their agreement terms have expired," Union Director Bernard Pitts said. "The original agreement was for 1995 through 1997 with three successive one-year extensions."

The restaurant could be gone by June 30.

Pitts has asked the University Purchasing Office to administer a Request for Proposal. The request will be an advertisement for businesses interested in the space in the Union's recreation level.

Carla Bishop, assistant director of the Controllers Office, said the requests are sent to businesses who have expressed interest.

"We send the RFPs to businesses who have expressed an interest in the past, and we also try the shotgun approach," she said. "After we send the request for proposals out, we also post the request in the Kansas Register. That way it's fair for all."

Pitts was unsure who would get the new contract because the requests had not been sent out.

"We do not know if other businesses are looking to sign a contract," Pitts said. "This is unknown until we receive responses from the RFP."

Cindie Snyder, Union marketing and promotion manager, said the request is an opportunity for anyone to buy the space.

"We hope Subway will return," she said, "but the bidding situation is the only fair way to do it."

Carla Bishop said the RFPs sent outline the terms and conditions for business in the Union.

"This procedure helps provide a level playing field for all interested businesses," Bishop said.

Bishop said when the request for proposals is posted, it will remain for a three-week time period.

"After we receive the proposal, we will negotiate them," Bishop said. "We try to get a tabulation of each of them to see their requirements. We look at the requirements that each vendor needs compared to what already exists. Then, if anything in the proposal is unclear, we will get clarification before a decision is made."

Pitts said the Union is seeking a business to sign a three-year agreement with two successive one-year extensions. He also said the current Subway operator has indicated an interest in responding to the request.

"This is a routine procedure after a contract expires," Pitts said. "We will make all attempts to avoid any lapse in service."

Date auction raises money for local women's center

By COLLEEN FOOTE
Kansas State Collegian

People at Goodnow Hall will do anything to get a date ... even buy one.

On Thursday, Goodnow Hall sponsored its second annual date auction. The proceeds went toward the Women's Crisis Center.

Ten Goodnow residents volunteered to be auctioned off at the event.

"This is a fun-filled event that benefits a great cause," said Jeff Payne, sophomore in elementary education and resident assistant in Goodnow Hall. "We are very proud of the date auction, and we have put a lot of effort into the entire process."

The auction was organized so that one male and one female would be auctioned off together. This enabled the dates to take place between more than just two people, auctioneer Jason Baldridge, junior in public relations, said.

"It is a rule that at least four people attend the date," Baldridge said. "This enables and ensures the safety of the person who is bought."

Clinton Garrett, junior in financial management, volunteered to be auctioned because of the charity.

"Of course, I am a little nervous to stand in front of everyone, but this is for a good cause," Garrett said. "I'll be happy for anything over $15."

He was bought for $60 by Christina Romeo, junior in elementary education.

"I hardly know him, but I think a night out with him would be fun," Romeo said. "I think this is a wonderful cause, and it is great that he has the guts to stand up there."

JEANEL DRAKE/Collegian

Judy Davis, director of the crisis center, said she was grateful the residents of Goodnow decided to give money to the crisis center. Speaking at the Date Auction, she reminded the residents of the importance of domestic and sexual violence awareness.

"I feel confident standing in a room full of young men and women like this that, someday, domestic and sexual violence will cease to exist," Davis said. "You are your brothers' and your sisters' keepers, and you're the best tool from keeping harm from others."

Each couple auctioned off dressed in different themes, such as nerdy, country, formal and hip.

Justin Mencl, sophomore in computer science, said he decided to be auctioned off because he heard how much fun it was last year.

"I've heard so much about this event," said Mencl, who was bought for $65. "I already knew who was going to buy me, so that made it easier going out there."

The highest bid was $400 for a date with Lisa Martin, freshman in open-option and member of K-State's volleyball team. Overall, the event raised a total of $1,176.

"We are extremely, extremely happy," Payne said.
